Trump charged with 37 counts

Indictment says the former president and 2024 candidate violated Espionage Act, illegally storing nuclear and other top-secret records, sharing some files

WASHINGTON — Former President Trump was indicted on 37 charges, including 31 counts of violations of the Espionage Act, as part of special counsel Jack Smith's investigation into Trump's handling of classified documents from his time in the White House.

The 49-page indictment, released Friday by the Justice Department, details accusations that Trump stored boxes of classified documents in various locations at Mar-a-Lago, his Florida estate, including in a ballroom, a bathroom and shower, his office, his bedroom and a storage room.

According to the indictment, among the top-secret and other classified records were details on foreign nations' nuclear capabilities, as well as information regarding defense and weapons capabilities of both U.S. and foreign countries, U.S. nuclear programs, potential vulnerabilities of the U.S. and its allies to military attack, and plans for possible retaliation in response to an attack.

The indictment includes several photos of the boxes in different locations around Mar-a-Lago, including on a ballroom stage, where they stayed for two months while the ballroom continued to be used for events. One of the photos is of a stack of boxes that had fallen over in a storage room, revealing documents marked with a designation that the information can be released only to the closest allies of the U.S.: Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

Trump is charged with crimes including willful retention of national defense information, conspiracy to obstruct justice, withholding a document or record, corruptly concealing a document in a federal investigation, scheming to conceal, and false statements and representations.

In a brief televised statement, Smith urged the public to read the indictment in order to understand "the gravity of the crimes

Key allegations against Trump

- That he retained documents detailing U.S. vulnerabilities to attack and the military capabilities of the U.S. and other countries;
- That he stored them in boxes that weren't behind locked doors, including on the stage of a ballroom and in a bathroom;
- That twice in 2021, he showed a classified document to individuals without security clearances;
- That he questioned whether he needed to comply with an FBI subpoena, asking his lawyer: "Wouldn't it be better if we just told them we don't have anything here?"
- That at his order, only some of the boxes of documents were made available when his lawyer searched for classified records to comply with the subpoena.

Lots more water, but aquifers remain depleted

Storms alleviated deficit, but Central Valley groundwater levels are still low.

By Ian James

The historic winter storms that filled California's reservoirs and covered the Sierra Nevada with snow have brought a major boost to water supplies across Central Valley watersheds — an increase that measurements from NASA satellites show is the largest year-over-year gain in more than two decades of records.

Satellite data analyzed by researchers at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory show that the series of atmospheric river storms this winter alleviated some of California's water deficit, but that groundwater levels remain depleted from years of drought and chronic overpumping in the Central Valley.

The two satellites, a joint U.S.-German mission called GRACE Follow-On, measure changes in the total volume of water contained in snowpack, soil, rivers, lakes and groundwater.

NASA scientists found that between October 2022 and March, the rain and snow increased the region's total water supplies substantially, equating to a rise of about 20 inches if that water were spread across the watersheds of the Central Valley.

That amounts to about 2.5 times the total storage capacity of Lake Mead, the country's largest reservoir, or about 58% of the volume of Lake Tahoe.

The water gain was about double the annual average recorded in satellite data since 2002. Even with this influx of water, however, scientists said they don't yet know how much of it will make its way underground, and that it will probably recoup only a portion of the groundwater that has been extracted to supply agriculture during years of severe drought.

"One good winter of rain and snow won't make up for years of extreme drought and extensive groundwater use," said Felix Landerer, a research scientist at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

At Pride, queer Angelenos 'show our joy' amid backlash

Anti-LGBTQ+ efforts by conservatives make the celebrations vital, community says.

By Hailey Branson-Potts

When West Hollywood incorporated in 1984 and seated the nation's first city council with an openly gay majority, it grabbed the world's attention — and not in an entirely positive way.

One year, council members got so many threats that they wore ballistic vests on a float in the L.A. Pride Parade, said Councilman John Heilman, who was on the inaugural council.

They weren't intimidated — too much was at stake.

"Us being out and being visible — that in and of itself is a political statement," said Heilman, 65, who is gay and has been attending Pride events for four decades.

Since then, there have been tragedies and trials — and immense progress as LGBTQ+ people found broader acceptance in American society, won the right to same-sex marriage and were allowed to serve openly in the U.S. military.

It seemed that, especially in liberal California, the LGBTQ+ movement had finally gone mainstream. To some, the colorful annual parades even became — of all things — kind of bland.

But this year, Pride Month comes amid a volatile national backlash against LGBTQ+ people, from conservative lawmakers' efforts to ban drag shows and restrict the rights of transgender people to outcry against brands such as Bud Light and Target for marketing to queer people.

Southland hotel workers approve a potential strike

Thousands could walk out as early as Fourth of July weekend if contract talks falter.

By Helen Li
and Suhauna Hussain

Jovani Ramirez wakes well before dawn most work days to head from his Santa Clarita home to his 6 a.m. shift as a cook at the Beverly Hilton hotel, one of the three jobs he juggles to support his family.

When he's done at 2 p.m., Ramirez travels to the nearby Century Plaza Hotel for another eight-hour stint. Then some nights he picks up a few Uber driving gigs. Ramirez said his commute can stretch to three hours each way, and he averages about 3½ hours of sleep a night.

"It's kind of hard for me because I never see my kids," ages 16, 12, 10 and 7, Ramirez said.

Ramirez on Thursday was among Southern California hotel workers who voted overwhelmingly to authorize their leaders to call a strike if their employers don't agree to major wage boosts in contract negotiations covering 15,000 workers in Los Angeles and Orange counties.

The authorization was approved by 96% of those who voted, Unite Here Local 11 said Thursday night. If a contract agreement isn't reached, a strike could begin as early as the Fourth of July weekend and would be the largest in modern U.S. history, the union said.

The previous record holder happened in 2018 when nearly 8,000 housekeepers, bartenders and other workers walked off the job at 23 Marriott hotels in eight U.S. cities, including San Diego, San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose. That strike lasted more than two months before final contract agreements were reached.

"I think we have to put a little bit in our power so we can get stronger and begin getting what we asked for. We ask what we ask for because that's what we deserve," Ramirez said.

When asked what a new contract with higher pay would mean for him, Ramirez began to cry.

"My youngest son has Down syndrome. I want to spend more time with my family. I want to not have to work two jobs," he said. Ramirez said his wife works part time because their son requires special schooling that isn't available near where they live.

Union officials have said their demands are crucial protection to ensure more

In much of world, taking a breath is unhealthy

Residents in some of the most polluted cities face variety of risks from dirty air.

By Suman Naishadham

WASHINGTON — Thick, smoky air from Canadian wildfires made for days of misery in New York City and across the U.S. Northeast this week. But for much of the rest of the world, breathing dangerously polluted air is an inescapable fact of life — and death.

Almost the entire world breathes air that exceeds the World Health Organization's air-quality limits at least occasionally.

The danger grows worse when that bad air is more persistent than the nightmarish shroud that hit the U.S. — usually in developing or newly industrialized nations.

That's where most of the 4.2 million deaths blamed on outdoor air pollution occurred in 2019, the U.N.'s health agency reported.

"Air pollution has no boundaries, and it is high time everyone comes together to fight it," said Bhavreen Kandhari, the cofounder of Warrior Moms in India, a network of mothers pushing for clean air and climate action in a nation with some of the world's consistently worst air. "What we are seeing in the U.S. should shake us all."

"This is a severe air pollution episode in the U.S.," said Jeremy Sarnat, a professor of environmental health at Emory University's Rollins School of Public Health. "But it's fairly typical for what millions and millions of people experience in other parts of the world."

Last year, nine of the 10 cities with the highest annual average of fine particulate matter were in Asia — including six in India, according to air quality company IQAir, which aggregates readings from ground level monitoring stations worldwide.

Fine particulate matter, sometimes denoted as PM 2.5, refers to airborne particles or droplets of 2.5 microns or less. That's far smaller than a human hair, and the particles can reach deep into lungs to cause eye, nose, throat and lung irritation and even affect heart function.

Sajjad Haider, a 31-year-old shopkeeper in Lahore, Pakistan, rides his motorbike to work daily. He wears a mask and goggles against frequent air pollution in the city of 11 million, but suffers from eye infections, breathing problems and chest congestion that get worse as smog grows in winter.

On his doctor's advice, he relies on hot water and steam to clear his chest, but said he cannot follow another bit of the doctor's advice: Don't go out on his motorbike if he wants to keep his health.

"I can't afford a car and I can't continue my business without a motorbike," said Haider.

Last year, Lahore had the world's highest average concentration of fine particulate matter at nearly 100 micrograms per cubic meter of air. By comparison, New York City's concentration hit 303 at one point on Wednesday.

ALTAF QADRI Associated Press

THE AIR in New Delhi is so dirty so regularly that it usually tops the list of the many Indian cities dealing with outdoor pollution on a daily basis.

But New York's air typically falls well within healthy levels. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's standard for exposure is no more than 35 micrograms per day, and no more than 12 micrograms a day for longer-term exposure. New York's annual average was 10 or below the last two years.

New Delhi, a heaving city of more than 20 million where Kandhari lives, usually tops the list of the many Indian cities gasping for breath as haze turns the capital's sky gray and obscures buildings and monuments. It's worse in autumn, when the burning of crop residues in neighboring states coincides with cooler temperatures that trap deadly smoke over the city, sometimes for weeks.

Vehicle emissions and fireworks set off during the Hindu Diwali festival add to the murk, and the results include coughs, headaches, flight delays and highway pileups. The government sometimes asks residents to work from home or carpool, some schools go online, and families that can afford them turn to air purifiers.

On Thursday, even as a hazardous haze disrupted life for millions across the U.S., New Delhi still ranked as the second-most polluted city in the world, according to daily data from most air quality monitoring organizations.

Kandhari, whose daughter had to give up outdoor sports over health scares related to the bad air, said the air pollution is constant, but policymakers only seem to notice its most acute moments. That has to change, she said.

"We should not compromise when it comes to access to cleaner air," Kandhari said.

Many African countries in the Sahara regularly grapple with bad air due to sandstorms. On Thursday, AccuWeather gave nations ranging from Egypt to Senegal a rating of purple, for dangerous air quality. It was the same rating given this week to New York and Washington, D.C.

Senegal has suffered unsafe air for years. It's especially bad in Senegal's east as desertification — the encroachment of the Sahara onto drylands — carries particles into the region, said Dr. Aliou Ba, a senior Greenpeace Africa campaigner based in the capital of Dakar.

The Great Green Wall, a massive tree-planting effort aimed at slowing desertification, has been underway for years. But Ba said pollution has been growing worse as the number of cars on the road, burning low-quality fuel, increases.

In the U.S., the 1970 passage of the Clean Air Act cleared up many smog-filled cities by setting limits on most sources of air pollution. The landmark regulation led to curbs on soot, smog, mercury and other toxic chemicals.

But many developing and newly industrialized nations have weak or little-enforced environmental laws. They suffer increased air pollution for other reasons, too, including a reliance on coal, lower vehicle emissions standards and the burning of solid fuels for cooking and heating.

In Jakarta, capital of Indonesia, the world's fourth-most populous country, it's often difficult to find clear blue sky, with power plants and vehicle emissions accounting for much of the pollution. It's also one of the world's largest coal-producing nations.

In one apartment building in the north of the city, between two busy ports where coal is shipped and stockpiled and where factories burn more, residents tried filtering coal dust with a net. It didn't work.

"My family and I often feel itching and coughing," Cecep Supriyadi, a 48-year-old resident, said. "So, when there is a lot of dust entering the flat, yes, we must be isolated at home. Because when we are outside the house, it feels like a sore throat, sore eyes, and itchy skin."

An Indonesian court in 2021 ruled that leaders had neglected citizens' rights to clean air and ordered them to improve it.

China has improved since Beijing was notorious for eye-watering pollution that wreathed office towers in haze, diverted flights and sent the old and young to hospitals to be put on respirators. When the air was at its worst, schools that could afford it installed inflatable covers over sports fields with airlock-style revolving doors and home air filters became as ubiquitous as rice cookers.

Key to the improvement was closing or moving heavy industries out of Beijing and nearby areas. Older vehicles were taken off the road, many replaced with electric vehicles. China still is the world's largest producer and consumer of coal, but almost none is consumed at street level. The average PM 2.5 reading in Beijing in 2013 of 89.5 — well above the WHO's standard of 10 — fell to 58 in 2017 and now sits at around 30. China had just one city — Hotan — in the world's top 10 for worst air.

Mexico City, ringed by mountains that trap bad air, was one of the most polluted cities in the world until the 1990s, when the government began limiting the number of cars on the streets. Pollution levels dropped, but the city's 9 million people — 22 million including suburbs — rarely see a day when air pollution levels are considered "acceptable."

Each year, air pollution is responsible for nearly 9,000 deaths in Mexico City, according to the National Institute of Public Health. It's usually worse in the dry winter and early spring months, when farmers burn their fields to prepare for planting.

Authorities haven't released a full-year air quality report since 2020, but that year — not considered particularly bad for pollution, because the pandemic reduced traffic — Mexico City saw unacceptable air quality on 262 days, or 72% of the year.

In the summer months, intense rains clean the city's air somewhat. That's what brought Verónica Tobar and her two children out Thursday to a small playground near one of the city's most congested avenues.

"We don't come when we see that the pollution is very strong," Tobar said. Those days "you feel it in your eyes, you cry, they're itchy," she said.

Her son was diagnosed with asthma last year, and changes in temperature make it worse.

"But we have to get out, we can't be locked up," Tobar said as her children jumped off a slide.

Mexico's employers must pay for internet for remote workers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's Labor Department issued new rules Friday requiring employers to pay for internet service and provide ergonomic chairs for employees working from home.

The new rules also mandate a "right to disconnect" for employees who work at least 40% of their time from remote locations. Remote workers often complain that, because they are constantly reachable at home, they are also constantly asked to work.

Mexico, like many other countries, saw a big increase in remote working during the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 and 2021. While office space occupancy is inching back up, remote work seems to be a trend that has caught on.

The trend is so pronounced that some office buildings on bustling downtown boulevards are being converted into apartments, hospitals and stores.

The Labor Department said bosses are responsible for paying for the electricity, printers and other equipment used when working at home. According to the new rules, if an employee's home isn't safe, well-lighted and well-ventilated, they can't be forced to work there.

Inspectors can visit a worker's home, or employees may be asked to take pictures of their home, to prove that it meets labor requirements.

Remote workers cannot be paid less than those who go to an office, and they must have set work hours.

According to the commercial real estate firm Newmark, Mexico City's office market has shown slight signs of recovery since the pandemic.

In a first-quarter 2023 research report, it said the city's office vacancy rate had declined to 23.4%, from 24.5% one year ago.

As in many parts of the world, some employers have adopted a "mixed" or hybrid model in which workers come into the office only part of the week. The new rules apply only to those who work remotely at least 40% of the week.

Ukrainians say flood rescue by Russia is selective

By Illia Novikov,
Yuras Karmanau
and Hanna Arhirova

Libkos

HELP HAS been slow in coming to Oleshky, a Russian-occupied town in Ukraine that was inundated after a catastrophic dam collapse this week. In Kherson, a woman and a disabled relative are among the evacuees.

KYIV, Ukraine — Alyona Shkrygalova's family kept a rubber boat for their daily needs along the broad Dnipro River.

The boat was nothing special until Tuesday, when the Kakhovka dam ruptured and sent a flood from Ukraine's largest reservoir into cities, towns and countryside downstream in a region that has suffered terribly since Russia invaded the country last year.

Water rose waist-high on the second floor of Shkrygalova's two-story house. She and her family began using their boat to scavenge for food and find houses on higher ground with dry places to sleep. That way, they survived in the war zone until Shkrygalova, 60, spotted a group of people in a boat and raised yellow, white and pink fabrics to get their attention.

"We were scared, we were trying to understand, 'Who's approaching us? Are they Russian or not?' We raised a flag," Shkrygalova said.

Lucky for her and her family, they were Ukrainians.

According to those stranded and their Ukrainian rescuers, Russian forces are taking rescuers' boats. Some say the soldiers will help only people with Russian passports.

"Russian soldiers are standing at the checkpoints, preventing [rescuers] from approaching the most-affected areas and taking away the boats," said one volunteer, Yaroslav Vasiliev. "They are afraid of saboteurs, they suspect everyone."

Others have been turned away from rescue.

Viktoria Mironova-Baka said she has been in touch from Germany with relatives stuck in the flooded region.

"My relatives said that Russian soldiers were coming up to the house today by boat, but they said they would only take those with Russian passports," she told the Associated Press. Her grandmother, aunt and more than a dozen other people are taking shelter in the attic of a two-story house.

Details of life in Russian-occupied Ukraine are often unclear. The AP could not independently verify reports of boat seizures or that only Russians were being evacuated, but the account is in line with reporting by independent Russian media.

It's a sharp contrast to Ukrainian-controlled territory flooded by the dam collapse. Authorities there have aggressively evacuated civilians and brought in emergency supplies. On Thursday, President Volodymyr Zelensky traveled to the area to assess the damage. Russian President Vladimir Putin "has no plans at the current moment" to visit affected Moscow-occupied areas, Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov said.

The latest disaster in the region began Tuesday, when the Kakhovka hydroelectric dam, roughly 50 miles upstream from the town of Oleshky, collapsed, sending torrents of water down the Dnipro and across the war's front lines. The Russian-occupied town across the river from the city of Kherson had a prewar population of 24,000.

Officials say that more than 6,000 people have been evacuated from dozens of inundated cities, towns and villages on both sides of the river. But the true scale of the disaster remains unclear for a region that was once home to tens of thousands of people.

Officials on both sides indicated that about 20 people were known to have died, but the figures could not be independently verified. Oleshky's Ukrainian mayor, Yevhen Ryshchuk, said corpses were floating to the surface.

Many of the survivors are homeless, and tens of thousands are without drinking water.

The floods ruined crops, dislodged land mines, caused widespread environmental damage and set the stage for long-term electricity shortages.

Ukraine says Russia destroyed the dam with explosives. Russia accuses Ukraine of destroying it with a missile strike.

A drone flown Wednesday by an AP team over the dam's wreckage revealed none of the scorch marks or shrapnel scars typical of a bombardment. The bulk of the dam is submerged, and the AP images offered a limited snapshot, making it difficult to rule out any scenario. The dam also had been weakened by Russian neglect, and water had been washing over it for weeks. It had been under Russian control since the invasion in February 2022.

Compounding the tragedy, Russia has been shelling flooded areas, including the front-line city of Kherson. On Thursday, Russian shelling echoed not far from a square in Kherson where emergency crews and volunteers were dispensing aid. Some evacuation points in the city were hit, wounding nine people, according to Ukrainian officials.

Russia claims that the Ukrainians also have been shelling flood-stricken areas under Moscow's control. Peskov, the Kremlin spokesman, praised the "selfless work" of Russian emergency teams helping flood victims, noting that they have been working under constant Ukrainian shelling.

"People who suffered from the flooding have been killed by the shelling, including a pregnant woman," Peskov said.

Ryshchuk, the Oleshky mayor, said that by Thursday afternoon water levels were beginning to fall, but roughly 90% of the city remained flooded.

He fled after Russian forces tried to force him to collaborate, but he remains in close contact with people in and around the city.

Russia says it is helping the region's civilians. Moscow-appointed regional Gov. Vladimir Saldo claimed more than 4,000 people had been evacuated from the flood zones. He shared a video showing empty beds in shelters prepared for evacuees.

Ryshchuk dismisses such talk.

He said some people trying to leave flooded areas were forced back by Russian soldiers who accused them of being "waiters" — people waiting for Ukraine to reclaim control of the region.

Others, who called the Russian-controlled emergency services, were told they would have to wait for help, he said.

"That's it," he said. "Yesterday, some Russians came in the morning, took a few people off the roofs, filmed a video, and left. That's everything they have done as of today."

Novikov, Karmanau and Arhirova write for the Associated Press and reported from Kyiv; Tallinn, Estonia; and Warsaw, respectively.

Facing 'partygate' sanctions, Boris Johnson resigns as MP

By Jill Lawless

LONDON — Former Prime Minister Boris Johnson shocked Britain on Friday by quitting as a lawmaker after being told he will be sanctioned for misleading Parliament.

Johnson departed as a member of Parliament with a ferocious tirade at his political opponents — and Prime Minister Rishi Sunak — that could blast open tensions within the governing Conservative Party.

Johnson resigned after receiving the results of an investigation by lawmakers into misleading statements he made to Parliament about "partygate," a series of rule-breaking government parties held during the COVID-19 pandemic.

In a lengthy resignation statement, Johnson accused opponents of trying to drive him out — and hinted that his roller-coaster political career might not be over.

"It is very sad to be leaving Parliament — at least for now," he said.

Johnson, 58, said he had "received a letter from the Privileges Committee making it clear — much to my amazement — that they are determined to use the proceedings against me to drive me out of Parliament."

He called the committee investigating him, which has members from both government and opposition parties, a "kangaroo court."

"Their purpose from the beginning has been to find me guilty, regardless of the facts," Johnson said.

The resignation will trigger a special election to replace Johnson in a suburban London seat in the House of Commons.

Johnson, whose career has seen a series of scandals and comebacks, led the Conservatives to a landslide victory in 2019 but was forced out by his own party more than two years later.

He had been awaiting the outcome of an investigation by a House of Commons standards committee over misleading statements he made to Parliament about gatherings in 2020 and 2021 in government buildings, events that breached pandemic lockdown rules.

Police eventually issued 126 fines over the boozy soirees and "wine time Fridays," including one to Johnson. The scandal hastened the end of his premiership.

Johnson has acknowledged misleading Parliament when he assured lawmakers that no rules had been broken but said he didn't do so deliberately. He told the committee he "honestly believed" the five events he attended, including a send-off for a staffer and his own surprise birthday party, were "lawful work gatherings" intended to boost morale among overworked staff members coping with the pandemic.

The committee had been expected to publish its report in the next few weeks, and Johnson could have faced suspension from the House of Commons if he was found to have lied deliberately. By quitting, he avoids a suspension that could have seen him ousted from his Commons seat by his constituents, leaving him free to run for Parliament again. His resignation statement suggested he was mulling that option.

The statement is highly critical of Sunak, who served as Treasury chief in Johnson's government before jumping ship with many other colleagues in July 2022 — resignations that forced Johnson out.

Johnson took aim at Sunak, who was chosen by the Conservatives in October to steady the government in the wake of the terms of Johnson and successor Liz Truss, who stepped down after six weeks when her tax-slashing policies caused turmoil.

"When I left office last year the government was only a handful of points behind in the polls," Johnson claimed. "That gap has now massively widened."

Conservative poll ratings went into decline during the turbulent final months of Johnson's term and have not recovered. Opinion polls regularly put the opposition Labor Party ahead by 20 points or more. A national election must be held by the end of 2024.

"Just a few years after winning the biggest majority in almost half a century, that majority is now clearly at risk," Johnson said. "Our party needs urgently to recapture its sense of momentum and its belief in what this country can do."

Johnson's dramatic exit is the latest — but maybe not the last — chapter in a career of extremes.

The rumpled, Latin-spouting populist with a mop of blond hair had held major offices, including London mayor, but also spent periods on the political sidelines before Britain's exit from the European Union propelled him to the top.

Johnson's bullish boosterism helped persuade 52% of Britons to vote to leave the EU, and he was elected prime minister in 2019 on a vow to "get Brexit done."

Johnson was less suited to the hard work of governing, and the pandemic — he landed in intensive care with COVID-19 — was a major challenge. His government won plaudits for its rapid vaccine rollout, but the U.K. had one of the highest COVID-19 death tolls in Europe and some of the longest lockdowns.

The final straw came when details emerged of parties held in Johnson's Downing Street office and home while the country was in lockdown. "Partygate" caused outrage and pushed the Conservative Party to oust its election-winning but erratic leader.

Angela Rayner, deputy leader of the opposition Labor Party, responded to Johnson's resignation by saying, "Enough is enough."

"The British public are sick to the back teeth of this never-ending Tory soap opera played out at their expense," she said.

Holloway case suspect pleads not guilty

In U.S. court, he faces the family of a young woman last seen with him in Aruba in 2005.

By Kim Chandler

Martin Mejia Associated Press

JORAN VAN DER SLOOT was extradited from Peru, accused of trying to extort money in exchange for disclosing the location of Natalee Holloway's body.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Joran van der Sloot, the chief suspect in Natalee Holloway's 2005 disappearance on the island of Aruba, walked into an Alabama courtroom in shackles on Friday as her parents looked on.

He pleaded not guilty to charges that he tried to extort money from the missing woman's mother in exchange for revealing the location of her daughter's remains.

Van der Sloot is not on trial for harming Holloway. However, the extortion and wire fraud charges are based on allegations that link the Dutch citizen to her disappearance on the final night of her high school graduation trip with classmates. Holloway, 18, was last seen leaving a bar with Van der Sloot, who was a student at an international school on the island, where he grew up.

Van der Sloot, now 35, was extradited Thursday from Peru, where he's serving a 28-year sentence after confessing to killing a Peruvian woman in 2010 — five years to the day after Holloway went missing.

Holloway's mother, father and brother were in the courtroom Friday. Beth Holloway stared at Van der Sloot occasionally but otherwise showed no obvious emotion.

"The wheels of justice have finally begun to turn for our family," she wrote in a statement, adding: "It has been a very long and painful journey."

Van der Sloot, wearing jeans and a white T-shirt, declined to use a Dutch interpreter offered to him at Friday's arraignment, saying, "I don't think it's necessary." During the brief court proceeding, he entered a plea of not guilty through his attorney and answered "yes" when asked whether he understood his rights.

Afterward, Beth Holloway hugged friends who had come to offer their support. She declined to comment outside the courthouse.

George Seymore, her spokesperson, told reporters that seeing Van der Sloot in court "was chilling but at the same time gratifying."

Natalee Holloway's disappearance sparked years of news coverage and numerous true-crime podcasts. Weeks after she went missing, Van der Sloot was identified as a main suspect and detained for questioning along with two Surinamese brothers, but no charges were filed in the case.

A judge later declared Holloway dead, but her body has never been found.

Prosecutors in the U.S. say that in 2010, Van der Sloot sought money from Beth Holloway in exchange for leading her to her daughter's body. A grand jury indicted him that year on those allegations.

In 2012, Van der Sloot pleaded guilty in Peru to killing 21-year-old Stephany Flores, a business student from a prominent Peruvian family, in 2010.

Van der Sloot married a Peruvian woman in July 2014 in a ceremony at a maximum-security prison. He was shuffled between prisons in Peru after reports that he was enjoying privileges such as television, internet access and a cellphone, and accusations that he had threatened to kill a warden.

Peru has agreed to let him remain in U.S. custody until the case in Alabama is concluded, including through the appeals process if he is convicted, according to a resolution published in Peru's federal register. U.S. authorities agreed to return him to Peru's custody after that, the resolution states.

Cindy Rysedorph, a friend of the Holloways, said they're doing as well as could be expected.

"It's progress," she said. "I'm so grateful that he's here."

Colombia reaches truce with its last key rebel group

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAVANA — Colombia's government and the country's largest remaining guerrilla group declared a ceasefire agreement Friday at talks in Cuba, the latest attempt to resolve a conflict dating to the 1960s.

The government and the National Liberation Army, or ELN, announced the accord at a ceremony in Havana attended by Colombian President Gustavo Petro, top guerrilla commander Antonio García and Cuban officials. The ceasefire takes effect in phases and will be fully implemented in August.

"This effort to look for peace is a light of hope that conflicts can be solved politically and diplomatically," top rebel negotiator Pablo Beltrán said at the ceremony.

The talks originally were scheduled to conclude with an official ceremony Thursday but were postponed as the parties asked for additional time to work on final details. Petro traveled to the island for the ceremony, saying it could herald an "era of peace" in Colombia.

Negotiations between the sides resumed in August after being terminated in 2019 when the rebels set off a car bomb at a police academy in Bogota, killing 21 people.

After that incident, the government of then-President Iván Duque issued arrest warrants for ELN leaders in Cuba for the peace negotiations. But Cuba refused to extradite them, arguing that doing so would compromise its status as a neutral nation and break with diplomatic protocols.

Talks relaunched in November, shortly after Petro was elected as Colombia's first leftist president.

Petro has pushed for what he calls a "total peace" that would demobilize all of the country's remaining rebel groups as well as its drug trafficking gangs. He has questioned whether senior ELN leaders have full control of a younger generation of commanders who he has suggested are focused more on the illegal drug trade than on political goals.

The ELN was founded in the 1960s by union leaders, students and priests inspired by the Cuban Revolution. It is Colombia's largest remaining rebel group and has been notoriously difficult for previous governments to negotiate with.

In 2016, the government signed a peace deal with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, that ended five decades of conflict in which an estimated 260,000 people were killed.

Bond for woman who shot neighbor

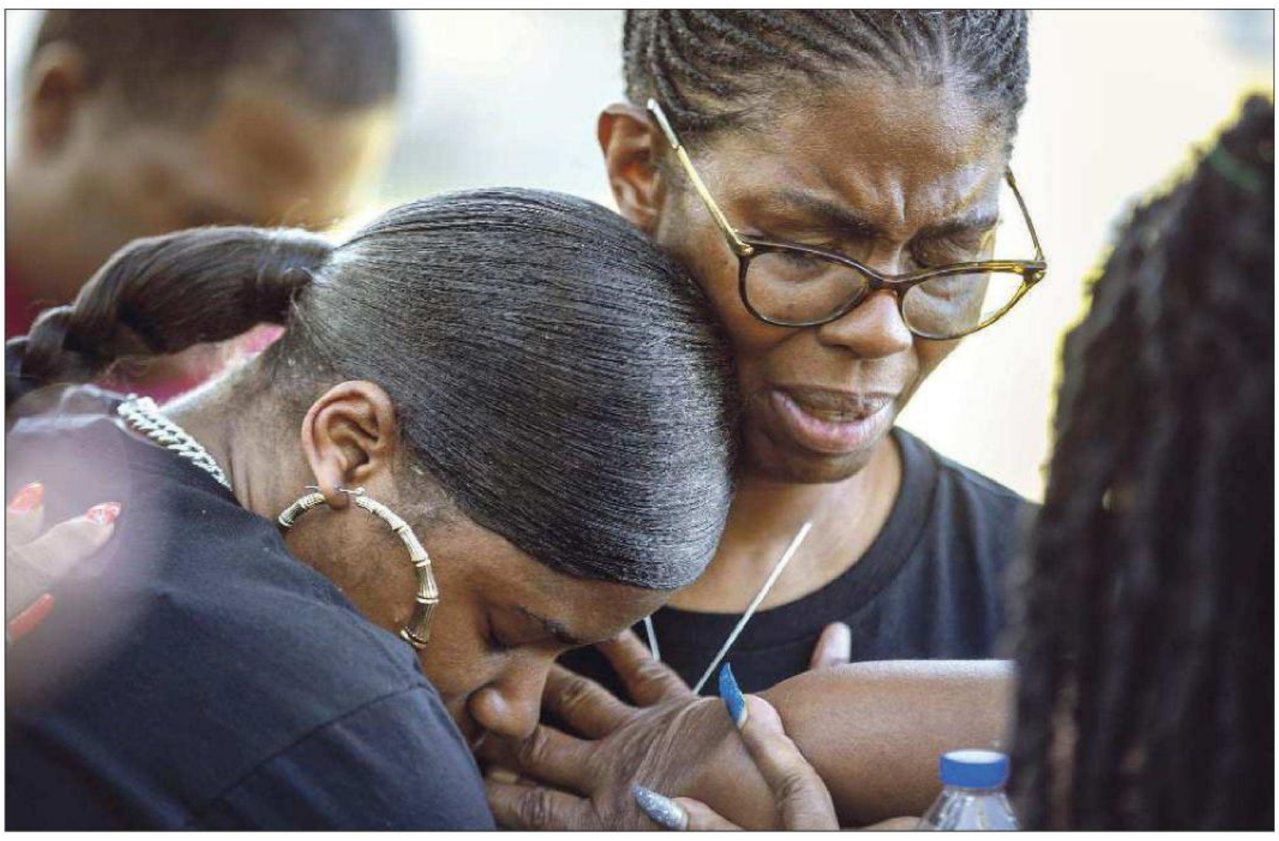
Florida shooter facing felony is ordered to stay away from the family of the victim.

ASSOCIATED PRESS



Alan Youngblood Associated Press

TMIKA WILKERSON, left, and Kimberly Wilkerson pray as mourners gather Thursday in Ocala., Fla., for Ajike Owens. Authorities say Susan Louise Lorincz, 58, fatally shot Owens through Lorincz's front door.

OCALA, Fla. — A judge granted a $154,000 bond Friday for a white Florida woman charged with fatally shooting a Black neighbor through her front door.

Susan Louise Lorincz, 58, of Ocala returned to court in Marion County a day after she pleaded not guilty to a first-degree felony charge of manslaughter with a firearm, as well as counts of culpable negligence, battery and assault.

As a condition of Lorincz's bond, Circuit Court Judge Robert Hodges ordered her to wear an ankle monitor and stay away from the family of her slain neighbor, Ajike Owens, 34.

The courtroom was packed with relatives and supporters of Owens, a mother of four children. One of the family's attorneys, Anthony Thomas, told reporters after the Friday hearing that they would continue to push for Lorincz to face a more serious charge of second-degree murder.

"We don't believe that Susan had any sort of respect at all for human life," Thomas said. "This wasn't something where she was cleaning a gun and the gun went off and it goes through the wall or the door and it accidentally hurts somebody. She meant to pull that trigger. She meant to point it at the door."

Owens was killed June 2 in Ocala, about 80 miles north of Orlando. Her funeral is scheduled for Monday.

After the shooting, Lorincz, who is white, told investigators she had had problems for two years with being disrespected by children in the neighborhood — including Owens' children, who are ages 12, 9, 7 and 3.

According to an arrest report from the Marion County Sheriff's Office, Lorincz said she had a headache the day of the shooting and children were running and yelling outside her apartment. That night, while a few children were playing basketball, Lorincz threw a pair of roller skates at them, hitting one on the feet, the arrest report said.

Owens then came over and knocked on Lorincz's door. Lorincz told investigators that Owens threatened to kill her and banged on the door so hard that she feared Owens would break it down, the report said.

Lorincz fired a round from her .380-caliber handgun, the sheriff's report says, which went through the closed door and fatally struck Owens.

Lorincz told investigators that she had called Owens' children racist slurs in the months before the killing. Authorities delayed her arrest for several days while looking into a possible " stand your ground " claim.

Detectives have since said that Lorincz's actions are not justifiable under Florida law.

Marion County Sheriff Billy Woods said that since January 2021, deputies responded to at least a half-dozen complaints between Owens and Lorincz.

U.S. is boosting weapons funding to Kyiv

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon announced Friday that it will provide an additional $2.1 billion in long-term weapons aid to Ukraine. The new assistance package will include funding for more Patriot missile battery munitions, Hawk air defense systems and missiles, and small Puma drones that can be launched by hand.

The latest infusion of funding, one of the larger packages the U.S. has provided, comes as there are signs that Ukraine is beginning — or about to begin — the much anticipated counteroffensive to try to take back territory that has been seized by Russia.

Unlike the U.S. equipment, weapons and ammunition that are more frequently sent from Pentagon stocks and delivered quickly to Ukraine, this money would be provided under the Ukraine Security Assistance Initiative and is meant to be spent over the coming months or even years to ensure Ukraine's future security needs.

In a statement, the Pentagon said the package shows the United States' continued commitment "to both Ukraine's critical near-term capabilities as well as the enduring capacity of Ukraine's Armed Forces to defend its territory and deter Russian aggression over the long term."

The aid also will include munitions for laser-guided rockets, an undisclosed amount of artillery rounds, and funding for training and maintenance support.

A number of administration officials have acknowledged that the fighting in Ukraine has intensified in recent days, but much of the focus turned early this week to the collapse of the Kakhovka dam on the Dnipro River. The White House and the Pentagon insisted Thursday that they are still working to determine who caused the damage, which set off a scramble to evacuate residents in dozens of flooded areas and get aid to those still there.

Although the U.S. has been willing to provide billions of dollars in military weapons and other aid, the Biden administration has been clear that there will be no American combat forces inside Ukraine. In that vein, Brig. Gen. Pat Ryder, the Pentagon press secretary, said Thursday that the military had no plans to directly provide transportation or other support to the areas damaged by the dam collapse.

The Biden administration has provided more than $37.6 billion in security assistance to Ukraine since Russia invaded in February 2022.

Fire risk follows animal farm to new home

By Kwasi Gyamfi Asiedu

WASHINGTON — Last year, Nate Salpeter and his wife, Anna Sweet, moved their animal sanctuary from California to western New York in the hopes of dodging the regular wildfires that had threatened their safety and the health of the creatures in their care.

But this week, Salpeter once again smelled smoke. Massive wildfires burning in Canada were sending huge plumes of ash across the U.S., forcing air quality warnings, baseball game cancellations and school closures up and down the East Coast.

For Salpeter, Sweet and the team at Sweet Farm Foundation, their new animal sanctuary on the west shores of Seneca Lake in Himrod, N.Y., the problem was all too familiar.

"You can barely see across the lake yesterday, and Anna said, 'I thought we left this behind,' " Salpeter said. "There's a little bit of PTSD involved from that whole experience."

For much of Thursday, the air quality in Himrod was classified as "unhealthy" by the U.S. Air Quality Index.

Salpeter and Sweet founded Sweet Farm in Half Moon Bay in Northern California in 2015. But in August 2020, the sanctuary was threatened by the CZU Lightning Complex fire, which ravaged San Mateo and Santa Cruz counties. In just four hours, a team of about 45 workers and community volunteers evacuated more than 140 animals, including cows, pigs, ducks, goats and a 37-year old stallion called Sturgis, to two other sanctuaries out of the raging fire's path.

The fire, which destroyed 1,500 properties and consumed 86,000 acres, spared the farm, but the sanctuary's team found the experience difficult nonetheless.

"Just going through that experience was extremely traumatic; it was stressful for the animals, for the team, and everyone involved," Salpeter told The Times on Thursday.

That close call was a catalyst. After years of wildfires, droughts and other extreme climate conditions, Salpeter and Sweet decided to relocate the animal sanctuary to Himrod, a town in western New York that they determined to be "climate stable."

"If it wasn't that [CZU fire] that actually burned down the farm or caused catastrophe, when would the next one happen and would that be the one that actually burns it down?" Salpeter said. "We wanted to [move] on our own terms, before it was an eleventh-hour emergency."

Climate change has influenced other Californians' migration decisions. Stanford University's Nina Berlin Rubin and Gabrielle Wong-Parodi found in a recent study of 1,100 California residents that "experiencing negative outcomes during the 2020 wildfire season was associated with an increased likelihood of intending to migrate." About a third of respondents intended to move in the next five years, and nearly a quarter of those likely to move reported that wildfire and smoke influenced their decision at least a moderate amount.

SWEET FARM, a sanctuary for animals like Sturgis, left Half Moon Bay for Himrod, N.Y., in 2022.

'You can barely see across the lake yesterday, and [my wife] said, "I thought we left this behind." There's a little bit of PTSD involved from that whole experience.'

— Nate Salpeter, Sweet Farm co-owner who moved to New York after a 2020 wildfire in Northern California

In May 2022, after months of planning, paperwork and animal blood tests, the Sweet Farm team loaded the cows, sheep, geese, pigs, llamas and chickens — and Sturgis — onto two 18-wheeler trucks to make the 47-hour, nearly 3,000-mile journey to Himrod.

A year later, Salpeter says he and Sweet have no regrets. The lake provides easy access to fresh water, and the region has a wine industry. They are no longer under the near-constant threat of wildfires and other extreme climate events.

But this week's harsh conditions have also provided a reminder.

"No one is immune, no one is completely unaffected by climate change, no matter where you're located," Salpeter said.

Man tied to Texas attorney general is charged in loan scandal

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — A Texas businessman at the center of the scandal that led to the historic impeachment of state Atty. Gen. Ken Paxton was charged Friday with making false statements to mortgage lenders to obtain $172 million in loans.

The federal indictment of real estate developer Nate Paul is the result of a years-long FBI investigation — a probe Paxton involved his office in, setting off a chain of events that led to a separate federal probe of the attorney general and his impeachment and suspension from office last month.

Paul was charged with eight counts of making false statements while seeking loans from mortgage lenders in the U.S. and Ireland. There was no mention of Paxton or the attorney general's office during the hearing.

Paul, 36, who entered the federal courtroom shackled and wearing jeans, a blue shirt and sneakers, did not enter a plea during his initial appearance in an Austin court and did not visibly react as the charges were read. He was released ahead of trial but ordered to surrender his passport and inform the court of any travel outside Texas.

After the hearing, Paul left through a back door and climbed into a car in a gated area outside the courthouse.

Paul is "adamant that he is not guilty," defense attorney Gerry Morris said after the hearing, adding that he did not know when his client last spoke with Paxton. An attorney for Paxton, Dan Cogdell, had speculated Thursday evening that prosecutors might use the charges against Paul to try to get him to "flip" and cooperate in the investigation of the attorney general.

Paul is accused of overstating his assets and understating his liabilities while seeking loans in 2017 and 2018, including by giving a financial institution false and counterfeit records. In one case, prosecutors said, Paul told banks he had $18 million in an account when he had less than $13,000. In another case laid out in the 23-page indictment, Paul is accused of having $28 million in liabilities but giving a credit union in 2018 a far lower number.

FBI agents examining Paul's troubled real estate empire searched his Austin offices and palatial home in 2019. The next year, eight of Paxton's top deputies reported the attorney general to the FBI on allegations of bribery and abusing his office, including for hiring an outside lawyer to examine the developer's claims of wrongdoing by federal agents.

The allegations by Paxton's staff prompted an FBI investigation that in February was taken over by the Justice Department's Washington-based Public Integrity Section. They are central to 20 articles of impeachment overwhelmingly approved by the GOP-led Texas House of Representatives. They include abuse of public trust, unfitness for office and bribery.

The impeachment accuses Paxton of using his office to help Paul over his unproved claims of an elaborate conspiracy to steal $200 million of the developer's properties. The bribery counts say that in return the developer employed a woman with whom Paxton had an extramarital affair and paid for expensive renovations to the attorney general's million-dollar Austin home.

Paxton's lawyers sought to rebut the latter claim this week by releasing a bank statement that included a 2020 wire transfer purportedly showing Paxton, not a donor, paying more than $120,000 for a home renovation. But the document raised new questions about the men's dealings.

The wire transfer was dated Oct. 1, 2020 — the same day Paxton's deputies signed a letter informing the head of human resources at the Texas attorney general's office that they had reported Paxton to the FBI.

The $121,000 payment was to Cupertino Builders, whose manager was an associate of Paul's, state corporation and court records show.

The company did not incorporate as a business in Texas until more than three weeks after the transaction took place.

A company of the same name was formed in Delaware in April of that year, although public filings there do not make clear who is behind it.

Paul has faced numerous lawsuits from creditors and business partners over the years, with several of his companies filing for bankruptcy or being placed under the supervision of court-appointed overseers. Last year, one of those receivers wrote in a report that Cupertino Builders was used for "fraudulent transfers" from Paul's business.

Paul has denied bribing Paxton. The attorney general has also broadly denied wrongdoing and said he expects to be acquitted during an impeachment trial in the state Senate. His wife is a member of the Senate.

The Senate will set its own rules for a trial that has little precedent, given that Paxton is just the third sitting official in Texas history to be impeached.

The proceeding is set begin no later than Aug. 28.

Paxton was separately indicted on securities fraud charges in 2015, though he has yet to stand trial.

Trump charged under U.S. Espionage Act

U.S. Justice Department

THE INDICTMENT against former President Trump included photos of boxes at his Florida estate, including in this bathroom in his residence there. He's accused of illegally sharing classified information with others.

[Trump, from A1]

charged." He also said he was aiming for a speedy trial.

"The men and women of the United States intelligence community and our armed forces dedicate their lives to protecting our nation and its people. Our laws that protect national defense information are critical to the safety and security of the United States, and they must be enforced," Smith said. "We have one set of laws in this country, and they apply to everyone."

The indictment details accusations that in two instances in 2021, Trump shared classified information with people who lacked security clearances.

The indictment also confirms a CNN report on the existence of a recording in which Trump indicates understanding that he cannot declassify records after leaving office and acknowledges that he possesses classified material.

The investigation began after the National Archives found classified records in a batch of documents Trump returned in 2022, a year after leaving office. Justice Department officials then had him subpoenaed, demanding that he return any other classified material in his possession.

The indictment cites notes from a May 23, 2022, conversation Trump had with his lawyer Evan Corcoran in which the former president questioned whether he had to fully comply with the subpoena, with remarks including, "I don't want anybody looking through my boxes. I don't want you looking through my boxes," "Wouldn't it be better if we just told them we don't have anything here?" and, "Well look, isn't it better if there are no documents?"

Trump's legal team ultimately produced about three dozen additional documents and a letter stating that a diligent search had turned up nothing more. But the indictment says Trump's lawyers didn't have access to all of the records for their search.

The indictment says that between May 23 and June 2 of last year — during the window after the subpoena was issued but before Corcoran could review the documents — Trump had his personal aide Waltine "Walt" Nauta move 64 boxes out of the Mar-a-Lago storage room to Trump's residence so the former president could go through the contents, and that Nauta later returned only 30 boxes to the storage room. This was hidden from Corcoran, according to the indictment.

The Justice Department learned of the alleged move and the possibility that classified documents remained at the estate, and gained judicial approval for a search warrant. More than 100 documents with classified markings were found in an FBI search of Mar-a-Lago that August.

The indictment says the recovered classified records came from the CIA, the Defense Department, the National Security Agency and the State Department, among other sources.

Nauta was indicted alongside Trump on charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice, withholding a document or record, corruptly concealing a document in a federal investigation, scheming to conceal and making false statements and representations.

Trump defended Nauta, a Navy veteran who was frequently by his side in the White House, in a Truth Social post before the indictment was made public.

"He has done a fantastic job! They are trying to destroy his life, like the lives of so many others, hoping that he will say bad things about 'Trump,' " the former president said of Nauta.

The special counsel's investigation has focused in part on Nauta, who is reportedly seen on surveillance video helping a maintenance worker move boxes from the storage room before the FBI executed the search warrant at Mar-a-Lago.

Jose Luis Magana Associated Press

SPECIAL COUNSEL Jack Smith urged the public to read the charges to see "the gravity of the crimes."

According to the indictment, Nauta made multiple false statements, including saying he was not aware the boxes had been taken to Trump's residence for review before 15 of them were sent to the National Archives, and didn't know how boxes taken to a National Archives truck had come to be in the residence; and that he falsely denied knowing where the boxes had been stored before they were found in Trump's residence, saying, "I wish I could tell you. I don't know. I don't — I honestly just don't know."

Trump announced in a social media post Thursday that he had been indicted in connection with his handling of the records and had been ordered to appear in federal court in Miami on Tuesday afternoon. The indictment comes nearly a year after the more than 100 documents with classified markings were found during the FBI's search of Mar-a-Lago.

The case appears to have been initially directed toward U.S. District Court Judge Aileen Cannon, a Trump appointee who handled his lawsuit last year over the FBI search. Cannon's decision to appoint a special master to review materials seized in the search delayed the investigation for several weeks.

Trump has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing, and claimed again late Thursday that he was innocent.

On Friday he announced that he was shaking up his legal team, replacing attorneys Jim Trusty and John Rowley with New York-based Todd Blanche and a firm to be named later. Blanche is assisting with Trump's other indictment on 34 felony charges related to an alleged hush money payment to porn actor Stormy Daniels in the final days of the 2016 campaign.

Trusty and Rowley said in a joint statement that they had resigned, calling it "a logical moment" to leave because the case had moved to Miami.

Trump and his allies quickly framed the new indictment as an attempt to diminish him as a political opponent, with some including Sen. Josh Hawley (R-Mo.) misrepresenting the legal process.

"If the people in power can jail their political opponents at will, we don't have a republic," Hawley, a lawyer and former state attorney general, tweeted.

Such claims disregard that it was a grand jury that recommended the charges based on evidence presented to it, and that it will be a jury that decides Trump's guilt or innocence on the charges based on the evidence provided in court.

Central Valley's groundwater levels are still low

Carolyn Cole Los Angeles Times

SNOW GEESE on a flooded field near Dunnigan, Calif. Researchers have said addressing the Central Valley's long-term groundwater deficit will probably require taking large portions of farmland out of production.

[Aquifers, from A1]

"We have accumulated quite a bit of water debt, groundwater debt, over the last 20 years," Landerer said.

Plotted on a chart, the satellite measurements of the total amount of water in the region form a line that, through seasonal ups and downs, has declined dramatically during the droughts from 2012 to 2016 and 2019 to 2022, reflecting major losses in total water resources. In 2023, the line has risen sharply.

"Even though we had a lot of water gain, much of that is in the surface," Landerer said. That means much of the water remains in rivers, lakes, reservoirs and the soil, as well as frozen in the snowpack. So far, he said, not much has percolated down to aquifers.

"It's actually pretty dry still down below," Landerer said. "The key point is now, how much groundwater recharge will there be?"

He and other scientists plan to track that as the snow melts and runoff courses through the Central Valley over the next several months.

In other recent research, scientists have found that the pace of groundwater depletion accelerated in recent years during the drought.

Data for the last two decades — and earlier data going back to the 1960s — reveal successive drops in average water levels in a steplike pattern, with brief wet periods that have only temporarily slowed the declines.

"Over the long term, groundwater is in a pretty steep decline," said J.T. Reager, a scientist at JPL.

"In wet years, we get a little bit of a recovery, and then in dry years, when there's not a lot of surface water or snowmelt, we tend to hit the groundwater really hard," Reager said. "We never get the recovery to replace what we're drawing down, what we're using during the dry years."

The Central Valley is one of the world's major farming regions, producing almonds, pistachios, grapes, walnuts, tangerines, rice and other crops, as well as cattle and dairy products.

The research is based on data collected from two NASA satellite missions. The current pair of satellites, which launched into orbit in 2018, track changes in Earth's gravity field to measure shifts in the total amounts of water, above and below ground.

"The big question for this year, with all of the snow and rain that we received, is really how much of that rain and snowmelt is going to recharge that groundwater?" Reager said. "How much of that water can infiltrate the soil?"

If all the water could be channeled underground, it would bring a tremendous recovery, he said. But he said it's possible a lot of the water may not reach the aquifer.

Part of the reason relates to the valley's geology. There are clay layers in many areas that hinder the downward movement of water, while in other areas, water passes swiftly through permeable layers of sediment.

The water streaming down from the Sierra Nevada has inundated vast farmlands in the southern San Joaquin Valley, re-forming Tulare Lake, which according to state officials now covers more than 113,000 acres, an area nearly as large as Lake Tahoe.

State water officials have sought to make it easier for local water districts and farms to use floodwaters to recharge depleted aquifers.

Since December, the State Water Resources Control Board has issued 10 temporary permits for agencies to divert water for groundwater recharge projects, all but one of them in the Central Valley. The board also approved a request by the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation to divert floodwaters from the San Joaquin River and send much of that water flowing to lands where it spreads out and soaks into the ground.

These approvals allow for the diversion of more than 1.2 million acre-feet of water — more than Folsom Lake reservoir can hold — for groundwater recharge, wildlife refuges and other purposes. State officials say it's the largest amount of water they have made available for groundwater replenishment in such a short period.

"The state has taken unprecedented action to leverage the benefits of our recent wet weather by replenishing our groundwater resources," said Yana Garcia, secretary of California's Environmental Protection Agency. She said it's an example of how the state is taking steps to become more resilient as climate change makes extreme droughts and floods more intense and more frequent.

State water officials have also been conducting aerial surveys to map optimal areas for groundwater recharge, using helicopters equipped with electromagnetic imaging systems that peer underground to reveal fast pathways for replenishing aquifers.

Meanwhile, the effects of overpumping have continued to affect rural communities, where some residents whose wells have gone dry rely on trucked shipments of water to fill their household tanks. The state has received reports of 249 dry household wells this year. State regulators have told local groundwater management agencies in large portions of the San Joaquin Valley that their plans for combating overpumping are inadequate.

Researchers have said that addressing the long-term groundwater deficit will probably require taking large portions of farmland out of production and that planning will be key in transitioning some agricultural land to other purposes, such as solar farms, crops that consume less water or habitat restoration areas.

This extremely wet year, and the historic levels of snowpack that remain, offer the conditions for a rare experiment to see how much the groundwater levels might rise in the Central Valley, Reager said.

"This year, we've got this nearly infinite supply of recharge," he said. "How much can you actually get in the ground? And that's what we're looking to see."

U.S. starts new search for nuclear waste storage

Eduardo Contreras San Diego Union-Tribune

ENERGY SECRETARY Jennifer M. Granholm speaks at the closed San Onofre Nuclear Generating Station, where 3.55 million pounds of radioactive spent fuel is stored — a source of anxiety for some Californians.

Feds will try 'consent-based' tack, seeking communities willing to take spent fuel rods.

By Rob Nikolewski

With the San Onofre Nuclear Generating Station as a backdrop, U.S. Energy Secretary Jennifer M. Granholm on Friday announced the Biden administration will spend $26 million in what figures to be one of many steps aimed at solving a decades-long problem: where to store the nuclear waste that has stacked up at commercial power plants across the country.

Saying that "we all have to figure out the solution" to the waste issue, Granholm said a national search will be launched to find communities willing to take spent fuel rods from sites such as San Onofre on an interim basis until the federal government finds a permanent repository.

The 3.55 million pounds of radioactive spent fuel stored at the closed San Onofre nuclear power plant has long been a source of anxiety for some Southern Californians, who pass the iconic twin domes as they drive along Interstate 5. More than 9 million people live within 50 miles of the plant.

Some 73 canisters loaded with spent fuel assemblies have been lowered into vertical cavities at a storage site on the north end of the plant, behind a seawall a little more than 100 feet from the Pacific Ocean. An additional 50 canisters of waste rest horizontally nearby.

To identify potential sites, the Energy Department will fund 13 groups from different areas of the country to engage, set up workshops and elicit feedback from communities that may be interested in building interim facilities. The 13 groups — partnerships with universities, industry and nonprofits — will receive about $2 million each.

"Some communities don't know what it means," Granholm said. "They might be in, they might be out, but the bottom line is we have to form trust and be able to educate them and work with them on what their concerns are."

Eventually, the Energy Department and the Biden administration want to find one to three communities for what the nuclear industry calls "consolidated interim storage" facilities.

According to a report released in April, the Energy Department estimates the entire process of identifying, screening, selecting and then building an interim storage site will take 10 to 15 years.

"In this phase, we're beginning the conversation," said Kathryn Huff, assistant secretary for the Office of Nuclear Energy at the Energy Department.

Rep. Mike Levin (D-San Juan Capistrano) accompanied Granholm on a tour of the San Onofre Nuclear Generating Station, known as SONGS.

"We finally have a plan when it comes to spent nuclear fuel across the United States," Levin said. "Now we've got to execute on that plan."

Under the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982, the federal government has a legal responsibility to dispose of the roughly 89,000 metric tons of waste that has accumulated at nuclear power plants in 35 states.

A giant underground permanent repository was near completion at Yucca Mountain in southern Nevada, but in 2010, the Obama administration halted the project, after years of opposition from Silver State lawmakers, including then-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

With Yucca off the table, focus has shifted to finding interim facilities.

To avoid a repeat of Yucca, the Energy Department is now taking a "consent-based" approach to find communities that may be open to building a storage facility because of the prospect of more local jobs and economic growth.

"Anything that doesn't include consent can easily be delayed or stopped completely," Huff said. "And we really intend to arrive at a robust and durable solution here — something that will outlast this administration and move out into a longer-term commitment."

But finding those communities may be difficult.

A proposed interim facility in southeastern New Mexico has been opposed by Gov. Michelle Lujan Grisham, and the New Mexico Legislature earlier this year passed a bill prohibiting the storage and disposal of radioactive waste without the state's consent. The issue may end up in court.

A similar story is playing out in Texas. A potential storage project in the town of Andrews is touted as being able to hold as much as 40,000 metric tons of spent fuel for up to 40 years, but, Gov. Greg Abbott tweeted, "Texas will not become America's nuclear dumping ground." (For perspective, San Onofre stores roughly 1,610 metric tons of spent fuel on its premises.)

One of the concerns for communities considering building an interim storage facility: Will they get stuck with the waste for decades, should the government not find a permanent site?

"That's why we want to have a discussion," Granholm said, "to let [the communities] know what the law says, what the specifics are, get them comfortable. If they don't want to do it, we don't want to force it on anybody. We're confident in the discussions that we've had at this point that there are communities that are willing to engage those discussions to have an interim site."

There have been signs of progress in other countries.

Finland, for instance, is nearing completion of its Onkalo spent nuclear fuel disposal facility that will permanently hold 6,500 metric tons of waste produced during the lifetimes of the country's five nuclear reactors. Canada is scheduled to announce a location for a national repository in the fall of 2024.

"We have not done this right in the United States in the past," Granholm said. "We have said, 'OK, Yucca Mountain, you're it,' without getting the consent of the community that is most affected. This is what we've learned from Finland and Canada. They had a process that was very respectful of communities ... and that's what we're going to do, too."

As for the search for a permanent site to replace Yucca Mountain, Granholm said that will begin once authorization is approved. "The first step is [interim facilities] and then we'll go on to that later."

On Capitol Hill, Levin has helped secure $93 million in funding in the last three fiscal years to move consent-based siting along.

Levin and Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Bonsall) this week reintroduced legislation that would give priority to remove spent fuel from decommissioned plants like SONGS that are in areas with large populations and seismic hazards.

"We know it can be done," Levin said. "We can do it here and it will work here, too. It won't happen overnight, but we've finally got the momentum that we've lacked for the last 10 or 15 years."

San Onofre has not produced electricity since 2012 after a leak in a steam generator tube led to its closing. The plant is now being decommissioned and is in the fourth year of a $4.5-billion dismantlement project that will take roughly eight years to complete and remove about 1.1 billion pounds of material from the site.

The plant's two distinctive domes, each 190 feet high, are expected to be gradually taken down starting at the end of 2026 or early 2027.

Representatives of Southern California Edison, which operates San Onofre, said more than 80% of the canisters could be taken off site now if a storage facility existed and 100% will be ready to be shipped by 2030.

Pandemic funding saved millions of people from eviction

Rogelio V. Solis Associated Press

APPLICANTS wait in line at a rental assistance fair in Jackson, Miss., in 2021. Housing advocates are urging the Biden administration to keep helping tenants.

More are caught up on rent than before the U.S. aid program, census surveys find.

By Jennah Haque

Edwin Bautista was a senior at the University of Texas at Austin and a part-time technician at a consulting firm when inflation started to ravage his spending power. After his rent surged past $1,000 a month in early 2021 he feared he would have to move out — until he got a $7,300 lifeline from the federal Emergency Rental Assistance Program.

That kept him in his apartment and even helped him build a small nest egg. Now graduated and working full time, he's a first-time home buyer.

Bautista is one of millions of renters who benefited from temporary programs put in place during the COVID-19 pandemic, including restrictions on evictions, income support — and the rental assistance program.

One of the most ambitious investments in emergency housing in the nation's history, it has disbursed $46 billion in aid to state and local governments since early 2021 and kept millions of people in their homes, according to an analysis of government data by Bloomberg News.

With rents still climbing and the economy at risk of a recession, housing advocates are urging the Biden administration to keep helping tenants.

That will be hard under legislation signed into law last weekend that suspended the nation's borrowing limit as it clawed back unused pandemic aid and imposed caps on future increases in the federal budget.

"We are facing an affordable housing crisis in this country, yet Republican lawmakers are insisting on slashing funding for and jeopardizing the future of critical housing affordability programs that support working families," Sen. Tina Smith (D-Minn.) said in a statement.

Surveys conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau show that, on average, 48.46 million people reported being caught up on their rent during the first quarter of this year, 4.7 million more than before the Emergency Rental Assistance Program was put in place as the economy was reeling from shutdowns.

Even though the estimated number of renters in the country increased during the period, the number of people behind on their rent fell.

> 'We faced a race with time. Experts were projecting a tsunami of evictions.'
> — Gene Sperling, coordinator of the Biden administration's American Rescue Plan

"These policies drove eviction filing rates to historic lows," a report from the Eviction Lab stated. Eviction filings were cut by more than half in 31 cities they sampled, largely due to COVID-era policies, according to the lab, a housing research group at Princeton University.

Nevertheless, Republicans have shown little appetite for continuing pandemic-era programs, including rent assistance, as they seek to reduce the federal budget deficit.

"Progressives' attempts to make crisis programs permanent, even after an emergency ends, is just another example of Democrats spending taxpayer money we don't have," Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.), a key negotiator on the debt limit bill, said in a statement. "Now it's time to end this program."

The Treasury Department let states, counties and cities use the emergency rent aid in one of three ways: on direct assistance to households, housing stability measures and administrative expenses. About $33 billion of the $46 billion was used for direct assistance to more than 7 million households, according to a Bloomberg evaluation of Treasury data.

States, on average, sent 70% of the funds they used directly to tenants and landlords, and those that spent most of the money for direct assistance tended to help more tenants get up to date on their rent — suggesting that the program was having the desired effect.

California, for example, used more than 75% of the $5.6 billion allocated to it from the rental assistance program for direct aid to tenants and landlords. The result: An average of 986,000 more renters were caught up on rent than before the program was established.

New York saw about 440,000 residents catch up, or almost 10% of the tenants in the state.

North Dakota spent less on rental payments and it is one of four states — Louisiana, South Carolina and Georgia are the others — that saw the number of tenants behind on rent grow.

Direct assistance was limited to renters with income below 80% of the area's median income and who were able to demonstrate that they were at risk of homelessness and were suffering a financial hardship because of the pandemic.

Bautista, the former University of Texas student, met the eligibility requirements.

He now works as a management assistant for a low-income housing coalition. On the side, he doles out affordable housing advice to college students and recent grads.

"I'm not supposed to be where I am today," he said. "This program changed my life."

The Treasury Department and state governments were criticized for disbursing money too slowly at the program's outset. Some states even had their funding reallocated.

The Treasury said it tracked some information, such as the number of dollars distributed, the number of households served and the demographics of its applicants. However, program administrators said they didn't have the bandwidth to measure or poll whether recipients were able to catch up on rent.

"We faced a race with time. Experts were projecting a tsunami of evictions if we did not get the emergency rental payments flowing before the eviction moratorium ended," Gene Sperling, a senior White House advisor and coordinator of the Biden administration's American Rescue Plan, said in a statement. "The fact that we actually saw eviction rates go below historic averages was proof we did get payments out in time."

Data on evictions are hard to come by, said Peter Hepburn, associate director of the Eviction Lab. There are more than 3,000 independently operated county courts that handle evictions, many of which often keep documents sealed, not digitized or both.

The lab credits the pandemic measures for preventing at least 800,000 evictions in 31 U.S. metropolitan areas it studied.

The rental assistance program itself "has been a godsend and a blessing for everyone who has been able to use those funds to remain housed," said Mark Fessler, deputy director of litigation and training at the nonprofit South Carolina Legal Services.

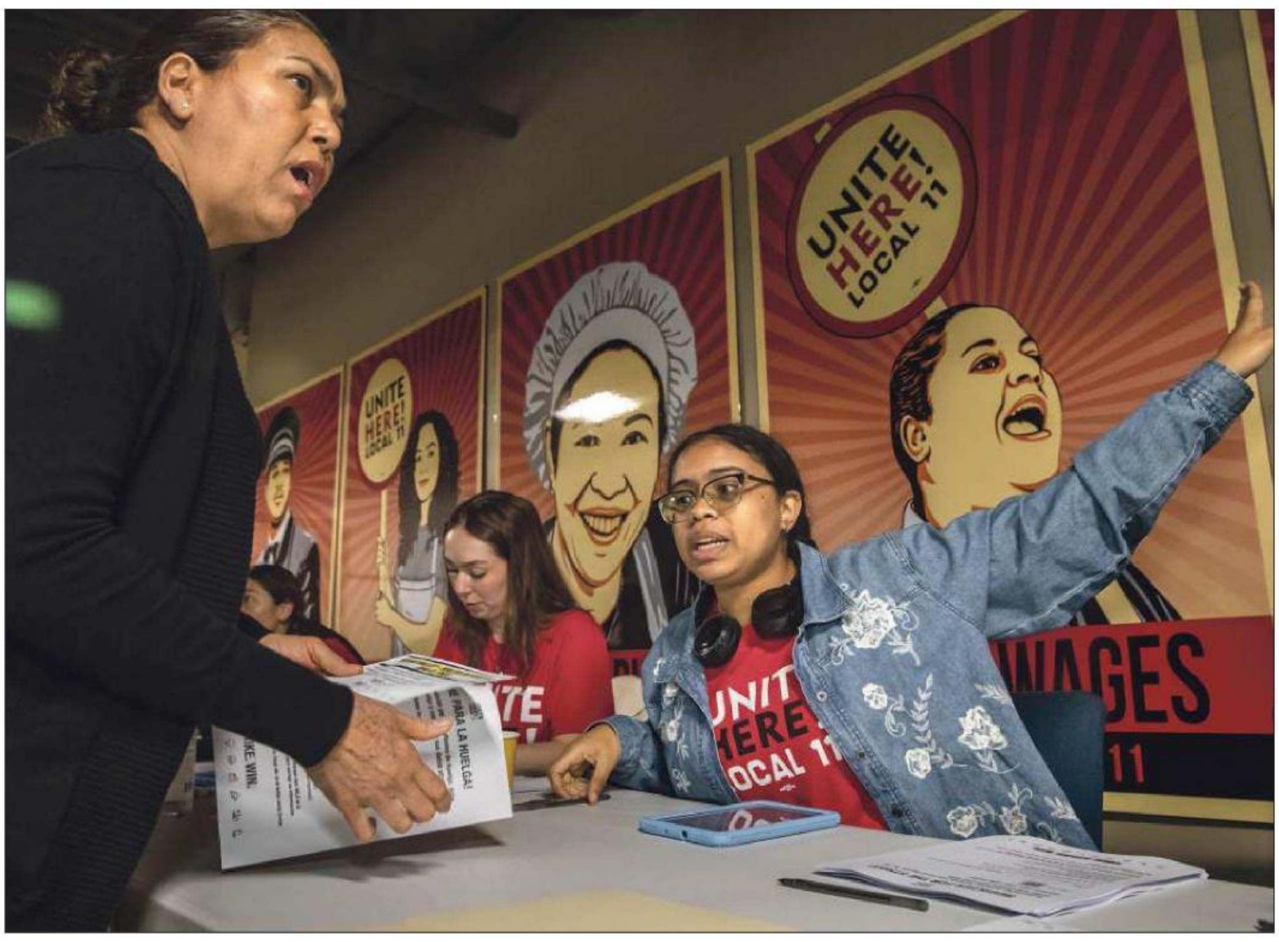
Southland hotel workers authorize strike



IRFAN KHAN Los Angeles Times

NOLA WATSON, seated, directs a hotel worker toward ballot boxes at a Unite Here Local 11 office in L.A. If a contract agreement isn't reached, a strike could begin as early as the Fourth of July weekend, the union said.

[Strike, from A1]

workers aren't priced out of their neighborhoods and all are fairly compensated as Los Angeles gears up to host the World Cup in 2026 and the Summer Olympics in 2028.

After a month of negotiations, hotels have failed to make any wage proposal, and the union called a strike authorization vote to "send a message to the industry that we're very serious," said Kurt Petersen, co-president of Unite Here Local 11, which represents more than 32,000 hospitality workers across Southern California and Arizona. Its members are non-management hotel employees, including people who staff front desks, clean rooms and work in hotel restaurants.

Contracts are expiring June 30 at 62 Southern California hotels, including luxury stays such as the Westin Bonaventure in downtown Los Angeles, the Fairmont Miramar in Santa Monica and the Beverly Wilshire in Beverly Hills.

"We're 22 days from the expiration of the contract and there's not a single nickel that they have offered as a raise for anyone in any of these hotels," Petersen said. "It's a total disrespect for their workers who sacrificed extraordinarily during this pandemic."

Marriott International, Hyatt and Hilton Hotels & Resorts are among the major employers in talks, and they didn't respond to requests for comment.

Peter Hillan, a spokesperson for the Hotel Assn. of Los Angeles, an industry group, said a Fourth of July weekend strike would "hold the community hostage" and hurt the hotel workers by harming the city's tourism appeal while the industry is getting back on its feet after pandemic shutdowns.

He said homelessness and the housing crisis have already given Los Angeles "a black eye" and have deterred tourism, particularly hotels' business from conferences and conventions.

"It's self-serving and injurious to the L.A. community to consider a strike at this time," Hillan said.

He declined to weigh in on negotiations between hotel companies and the union. The association's position, he said, is that displacement of workers due to high rental housing costs is not the responsibility of hotel companies and rather is an issue for city leaders "to engage in and solve universally."

"This is not specific to hotel workers. Teachers, construction workers, this happens to them also," Hillan said. "We work as hard as we can to pay good wages and benefits."

A Hyatt executive said last week that the company was disappointed the union was pushing a strike authorization so soon in negotiations.

The hotel giant "is committed to bargaining in good faith," Michael D'Angelo, a Hyatt vice president of labor relations, said in a statement issued May 31, noting that Hyatt and Unite Here have successfully negotiated agreements this year in other markets, including Long Beach. "We remain optimistic that a mutually beneficial agreement can be reached without a strike."

The union is asking for a $5 immediate hourly wage increase and a $3 boost each subsequent year of the three-year contract, for a total of $11. The union has also made proposals related to healthcare, pensions, workload and a policy against hotels using E-Verify, a federal system used to check work eligibility, to protect immigrant workers.

Hourly pay ranges from $20 to $25 for housekeepers and $22 to $28 for dishwashers and cooks, the union said.

Los Angeles City Councilmembers Curren Price and Katy Yaroslavsky in April proposed increasing the minimum wages of workers at larger hotels and Los Angeles International Airport to $30 an hour by 2028. The city's chief legislative analyst was directed to report back on the economic impact of the proposal, which a coalition that includes the Los Angeles Area Chamber of Commerce said would cost the region revenue and jobs and would cause prices to rise at local hotels as operators pass costs along to consumers.

The union said that on average, a local hotel housekeeper would need to work 17 hours a day to afford housing. Hospitality workers would need to earn $39.31 an hour to be able to pay rent on an average two-bedroom apartment in Los Angeles and Long Beach, the union said.

Many of the hotel workers interviewed Thursday said they have left Los Angeles to reduce costs and find affordable housing, but the moves have added to their commutes and gas expenses.

With her 7-year-old daughter in tow, Jaavonda Dartis waited to cast her vote outside a Beverly Hilton ballroom that the union rented as a polling place, one of many spots around the region where workers could vote.

Dartis said she is living paycheck to paycheck, even though she lives in a low-income building where rent is $1,080 per month. To pay for extracurricular activities for her daughter, who attends school in Inglewood, she sometimes pays other bills late.

When Dartis first started working at the Beverly Hilton in 2019, she said, the towers were under renovation. But business has returned and is better than before the pandemic, she said.

"They're booked solid until next year. Yet they can't give us these raises? This is ridiculous," said Dartis, a phone operator at the hotel, site of the annual Golden Globe Awards.

COVID-precautionary lockdowns helped to inflate hospitality workers' wages because scarce workers could command higher pay. But workers interviewed said high housing costs and gas prices in Southern California strain their budgets to the breaking point.

Every morning, housekeeper Francisa Gutierrez drives up to an hour and a half from San Bernardino to the InterContinental Los Angeles in downtown L.A.

"The babysitter makes half of what I make in wages," Gutierrez said through an interpreter. She earns $22 an hour and spends at least $200 on gas and $1,800 on rent, she said.

Gutierrez said she rarely sees her children, ages 2 and 6, because of work.

Ruth Hernandez, a housekeeper at the Hotel Figueroa, arrived at Unite Here Local 11's downtown office to vote from Koreatown. Although she is able to live near her job, she said, she hopes a new contract would help secure wages high enough that her co-workers wouldn't need to live so far away.

"There's a big workload and it's easy to get injured. We need a better raise to be fairly compensated and have a comfortable life," Hernandez said through an interpreter.

Southern California tourism has rebounded sharply from pandemic levels, with Los Angeles last year seeing 46.2 million visitors (91% of the visitor count in 2019, the last full pre-pandemic year), who spent $21.9 billion (89% of the pre-pandemic level), according to the Los Angeles Tourism and Convention Board. Orange County also experienced significant growth.

Many hotels nationwide eliminated automatic daily room cleaning during the pandemic when workers were especially scarce. Unite Here's Petersen said hotels haven't reinstated daily room cleaning as a way to save money even though "their industry is booming ... which means our room attendants end up having to clean rooms that are dirtier because they haven't been cleaned in several days, and there are fewer room attendants working."

Workers interviewed said their hotels are understaffed and employees are overworked.

"It's hard to keep employees. They expect so much from such little staff and the pay stays the same," said South Los Angeles resident Edwin Salguero, who works the 11 p.m.-to-7 a.m. overnight shift at the InterContinental in downtown. He volunteered to work night shifts because of a promised $1 extra in hourly pay, he said, but that pay boost never materialized.

"They care less now. It's the most brutal part of my work. We're getting the job done but we're not getting compensated [fairly]," said Salguero, who helps support his wife and three children.

Filadelfia Alcala, a housekeeper at the Waldorf Astoria in Beverly Hills, said wealthy guests who come in often spend lavishly. It's a stark contrast to her own pay, she says.

Alcala eats at the hotel's underground workers' cafeteria with Santa Rodriguez, who says workers at the luxury apartments and hotels in the area are moving farther and farther away.

"It's really about living a dignified life," Rodriguez said through an interpreter, "and making sure that working-class people can afford to live where they work."

MARKET ROUNDUP

S&P 500 drifts up ahead of inflation data

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Stocks inched higher Friday to close out a listless week for Wall Street, as investors wait for next week's slate of potentially market-moving updates.

The Standard & Poor's 500 rose 4.93 points, or 0.1%, to 4,298.86 to cap its fourth straight winning week. The Dow Jones industrial average advanced 43.17 points, or 0.1%, to 33,876.78, and the Nasdaq composite gained 20.62 points, or 0.2%, to close at 13,259.14.

Tesla was at the front of the market, rallying 4.1% after announcing that General Motors electric vehicles will be able to use much of Tesla's extensive charging network beginning early next year. GM rose 1.1%.

Energy stocks fell along with the price of crude oil. Exxon Mobil slipped 0.7% and was one of the heavier weights on the market. Ski resort operator Vail Resorts dropped 7.1% after reporting weaker results for the latest quarter than analysts expected.

This week has been relatively quiet for markets, even with the benchmark S&P 500 gaining enough Thursday to close 20% above its October low, entering a new bull market.

More movement is likely next week when the U.S. government releases the latest monthly updates on inflation at the consumer and wholesale levels. The Federal Reserve will also announce its latest move on interest rates.

So far, the economy has been able to avoid a recession even though the Fed has jacked rates up at a furious pace for more than a year in hopes of driving down inflation. The highest rates since 2007 have helped inflation come down some, but it's still above everyone's comfort level.

That means the big question on Wall Street is whether inflation will recede quickly enough for the Fed to take it easier on interest rates before the economy falls into a recession. A stronger-than-expected report on hiring last week raised hopes that the economy can slide through its troubles without a recession, but many other areas have already begun to crack.

"I can't tell you precisely when this recession will come to roost, but it feels likes it's coming," said Amanda Agati, chief investment officer of PNC Asset Management Group. "And the market is not priced for it. I don't want to be dramatic and say a day of reckoning is coming, but there will be a wake-up call."

Agati is expecting only a modest recession, not a deeply painful one like the downturns following the 2007-08 financial crisis and the 2020 onset of the COVID-19 pandemic. But she is concerned by how high the stock market has climbed, driven in particular by just a small handful of stocks.

"This is the market thinking we're going to muddle along and then the Fed is going to get out of the driver's seat: The Fed is going to cut rates, and we're going to power into 2024," Agati said. "And I think that's awfully delusional."

She says rates could climb higher than Wall Street expects and stay high for longer than investors are forecasting because inflation has remained too stubbornly high.

The wide expectation among traders is that the Fed will hold interest rates steady at its meeting next week. If it does, that will be the first meeting where the Fed hasn't raised rates in more than a year. After that, the bet is that the Fed may raise rates one more time in July before going on hold or even cutting rates by the end of the year.

Elsewhere on Wall Street, Adobe rose 3.4%, adding to its 5% leap the day before, which followed its announcement of a new artificial intelligence offering for businesses. It joined a frenzy around AI that has sent a select group of stocks soaring, including a 165% surge for chipmaker Nvidia so far this year.

Proponents say AI will be the next revolution to remake the economy, while critics say it's inflating the next bubble.

In the bond market, the yield on the 10-year Treasury rose to 3.74% from 3.72% late Thursday. It helps set rates for mortgages and other important loans.

The two-year yield, which moves more on expectations for the Fed, rose to 4.62% from 4.52%.

Donald Trump's inevitable but breathtaking federal indictment

HARRY LITMAN

Evan Vucci Associated Press

THE EX-PRESIDENT was charged with 37 counts related to retention of classified records.

In one sense, it was breathtaking: the first indictment of a former president by the Department of Justice he once oversaw — and therefore the most important federal charges in U.S. history.

In another, it was expected. Once Donald Trump had received a formal target letter from the department, his fate was in effect sealed.

But that was only the latest in a series of recent signs that charges were inevitable. The months and years of questions about whether the Biden administration should or would indict the 45th and would-be next president — and whether the department would stay its hand for politics, the good of the republic or some other reason — were settled when Atty. Gen. Merrick Garland appointed Jack Smith as special counsel.

From that point on, the investigation of the former president's retention of classified documents has followed the well-worn path that the federal government would tread for any defendant accused of behavior anywhere close to as brazen as Trump's over the last two years. Smith pursued the case as he would have any other, and that led ineluctably to the indictment unsealed Friday.

Almost as unavoidably, it will also lead to the department urging a court to impose significant prison time on the former president if he is convicted. Trump's last chance to bargain for less grave charges came and went in his lawyers' last meeting with Justice officials on Monday. Now he is in the unenviable position of any other defendant charged with such serious crimes.

Indeed, the 37-count indictment includes 31 counts of the almost astonishingly serious charge of violating the Espionage Act, compounding the severity of the case and the sense of national betrayal. The government alleges that Trump willfully kept sensitive information about U.S. and foreign defense capabilities and shared classified information with people who did not have security clearances.

It also charges a conspiracy to obstruct justice involving Trump and his valet Walt Nauta, who reportedly lied to FBI agents about the presence of sensitive documents, only to fess up during subsequent questioning. Nauta, who was also charged, is likely to be an important government witness — and, given his long-standing loyalty to Trump, a very credible one.

The indictment also confirms that former Trump lawyer Evan Corcoran will be another important government witness, perhaps the most important. He is the source of a series of incendiary and incriminating statements that the indictment attributes to Trump, including "I don't want anybody looking through my boxes" and "Wouldn't it be better if we just told them we didn't have anything here?"

The relocation of the unprecedented case from Washington to Florida is likely to make the case that much stronger. Although it may sound like a procedural detail, a defendant has a constitutionally guaranteed right to be tried where a crime was allegedly committed. A venue mistake could result in consequences as serious as a case being thrown out with no opportunity for retrial.

So the department made the strategic call that the case should proceed in the Southern District of Florida, which includes Trump's Mar-a-Lago estate and the scene of his allegedly illegal record retention. The grand jury was sitting in Florida for several weeks, more than long enough for it to absorb previous testimony in the case, which the department could provide by briefing jurors on what happened in the capital.

The location also has the effect of underscoring the most damning aspect of the case for Trump. His knowingly taking documents from the White House was almost certainly criminal; his brazen and quintessentially Trumpian refusal to return them, even to the point of lying to the government and involving others in the concealment, was worse.

The venue does heighten the risk that an ardently pro-Trump juror will simply refuse to convict him on any grounds, which, given the mind-boggling strength of the evidence, might be the defendant's only hope. But the justice system has already proved resilient, having produced another indictment of the former president, in New York, and an unfavorable civil verdict in the E. Jean Carroll sexual assault case.

With the venue issue put to rest, and with courts in the Florida district known for moving fairly quickly, a trial is likely to unfold sooner if the Trump-appointed judge initially assigned to the case doesn't cause unforeseen delays. It's even possible that Trump will be convicted by a federal jury before the 2024 election, for which he remains the overwhelmingly favored front-runner for the Republican nomination, though his appeals would probably continue.

The Department of Justice has shown the necessary steeliness and dedication to make history in undertaking this prosecution of a former president. And with Smith still investigating Trump's even more outrageous misconduct on and before Jan. 6, 2021, this first such prosecution may well not be the last.

Next week, meanwhile, Smith's deputies are expected to take their places at the table near the jury box in a federal courtroom and announce their appearance on behalf of the people in United States vs. Trump. Whatever else happens in the coming months, it's a proud moment and a banner achievement for the rule of law in this country.

LETTER FROM ...

Becoming a caregiver for my mom

I've long joked with my mom that I'd find a way to pay her back for all her trouble. Her response has always been "you're not supposed to," and she's right: Kids can't repay their parents, and I'd certainly never be able to.

Then she got brain cancer and I began to realize how much I owed.

My mother's sickness came on suddenly. She was working full time as a nurse at Los Angeles General Medical Center until early May, when a brainstem tumor emerged from hiding. She fell in her house on a Friday, and it's no exaggeration to say that she would have died on the floor if I hadn't broken into her home and called the paramedics. The tumor has taken away her ability to stand, open her eyes, swallow or speak clearly.

In the last month, my mom has been taken "from the country of the well across the stark frontier that marks off the land of malady," as the late Christopher Hitchens wrote when he discovered his cancer. And as her caregivers now, my brother and I migrated with her.

She's 65. My brother is 40. I'm 41 with three young kids. Most middle-aged Americans will eventually look after their aging parents in some way, even without the shock of a dire and unexpected illness. Many fear what that will involve, and for good reason: According to the World Economic Forum, the entire $6-trillion "care economy" risks collapsing under the weight of an aging population and healthcare worker burnout.

In a short few weeks, my family has been plunged into that economy and forced to plan for a future where there is no safety net or, at best, a frayed one.

While my mom is drifting in and out of consciousness in her hospital bed, my brother, the lawyer, works the phones. He's been gathering information to ensure that our mom's employer-provided healthcare coverage doesn't lapse or change in any way. And he relieves me at her bedside so I can go home and be a father for a few hours.

What I lack in my brother's professional skills, I make up for in experience. Six years ago, my wife was hospitalized and treated for cancer. The stilted conversations with doctors, the harried rearranging of life, the need to translate this health crisis for my kids, the skating on thin financial ice, the pangs of guilt from sliding into emotional numbness — I wish I didn't have to live through it again.

> Kids can't repay their parents. But when my mom suddenly got brain cancer, I began to realize how much I owed.

But there are moments of relief and comfort even in this land of the sick. We may have a complicated, scary, inadequate medical system, but the workers keeping it all together exhibit a kindness and competence that I can only marvel at.

The doctors — from the surgeon who threaded a needle into my mother's brain to the oncologists planning her chemotherapy — make me wish I had developed some kind of skill that could save lives. The nurses and their assistants who care for patients day and night deepen my awe for those called to my mom's profession. The security guard who prays for my mom makes me regret ever being unkind to anyone.

Even the caseworker who regretfully informed us that long-term skilled nursing care isn't covered by my mom's insurance is trying to help. Or it seems that way.

And my mom? She's been independent and strong her whole life, starting as a single, divorced parent of two toddlers back in the 1980s. She spent her career delivering healthcare to some of Los Angeles' most vulnerable patients, including jail inmates. She worked during a pandemic that exhausted doctors and nurses half her age.

And now, with a well-deserved retirement finally in sight, this.

My mom can never be repaid. But with her illness, my brother, my wife, my children and I have an opportunity to try.

Re "Bass' budget plan for Animal Services far less than sought," May 2

We animal activists — who spend our time, energy and money loving this city's unwanted and lost pets — deserve an animal services budget that works for us and the pets we care for. Instead, we are getting cuts.

Years ago, when cuts to the Animal Services department were proposed, I went to a City Council meeting to speak against that idea. I drove to City Hall from Pacific Palisades and waited for hours deep into the night to speak. When I got to the podium, I exclaimed, "Keep cutting their balls, but not their budget!"

Though the City Council voted against the cuts, things have not gotten better for our animals.

Frankly, most people don't deserve pets. But a civilized society must take care of its underdogs, even if they are actually dogs.

Let's get a budget that works. Let's get a general manager who really cares about the discarded, lost and ill pets coming into the shelters, and let's appreciate the volunteers who devote their time and money to caring for animals that so few others even think about.

The Times could do its part by refusing ads from breeders. You are part of the problem.

Supporting journalism in an era of layoffs

Re "L.A. Times to cut 74 newsroom jobs as ads decline," June 8

Having subscribed to the Los Angeles Times for many years, I read with concern that cuts had to be made to newsroom staff.

The Times has an excellent team of seasoned reporters. Where else can one get reliable information about what's going on in the city and in our government, including the City Council, local school boards and the California Legislature? The Times also provides fine coverage of business, sports and entertainment.

My favorite part of the paper, aside from the Jumble, is the Opinion page, where I get to learn the thoughts of many people, including columnists and letter writers. Some of these people are very bright; others, I suspect, may not read The Times quite so carefully.

We can all play a role in keeping our Los Angeles Times going strong by renewing our subscriptions, encouraging others to subscribe and, if one can afford it, by gifting a subscription to a younger family member or friend.

David Michels, Encino

When The Times' new ownership took over in 2018, I was hopeful that your paper would become more fair and balanced and attract an expanded reader base.

That appears not to have happened. Even the sinking CNN appears to be seeing the light.

Although I do enjoy glancing at the headlines of your stable of liberal columnists, I look forward to the day that I will enjoy more than just your world-class sports section.

I am a 50-year print subscriber. Even as the paper has shrunk and shrunk in recent years, I've continued my subscription to support the extraordinary individuals who bring me my hometown news.

How do you lay off the stellar staff photographer Kent Nishimura? Or the young, vibrant staff trying to bring the woeful digital space into relevance? Or the editors, copy editors and other staff shockingly laid off this week who help make the paper make sense?

I love the ritual of reading my daily paper cover to cover. When there's no more left between the covers, what exactly am I paying for?

I am sad for those laid off. I am sad for my city. And I am sad for me. Find another way.

I am, and will continue to be, a supporter of The Times and newspapers in general. However, it pains me to pay hundreds of dollars more each year for your paper when its current form is a shell of the news coverage that your paper used to deliver.

Cutting more newsroom jobs hardly seems to be a solution to a declining subscriber base.

The California Journalism Preservation Act could reverse the downward spiral for newspapers. Every subscriber should lobby our Legislature to pass that law.

Freedom of the press as guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution won't mean much if the press disappears as an honest and fact-based sector.

The news business can still be a good investment, and newspapers and other news outlets don't need to lose money to exist. But, as fact-based journalists are replaced by an industry increasingly supported and controlled by advertising dollars and political messaging, real news will eventually disappear.

Aren't there maybe some creative ways to prevent this? For example, try bifurcating a newspaper into two related companies: one a community-supported, fact-based, 501(c)(3) tax-exempt journalistic entity, financially secure and protected from undue influence, and a second profit-oriented entity.

Otherwise we're headed toward a world where the only information available will be based on profitability or politics.

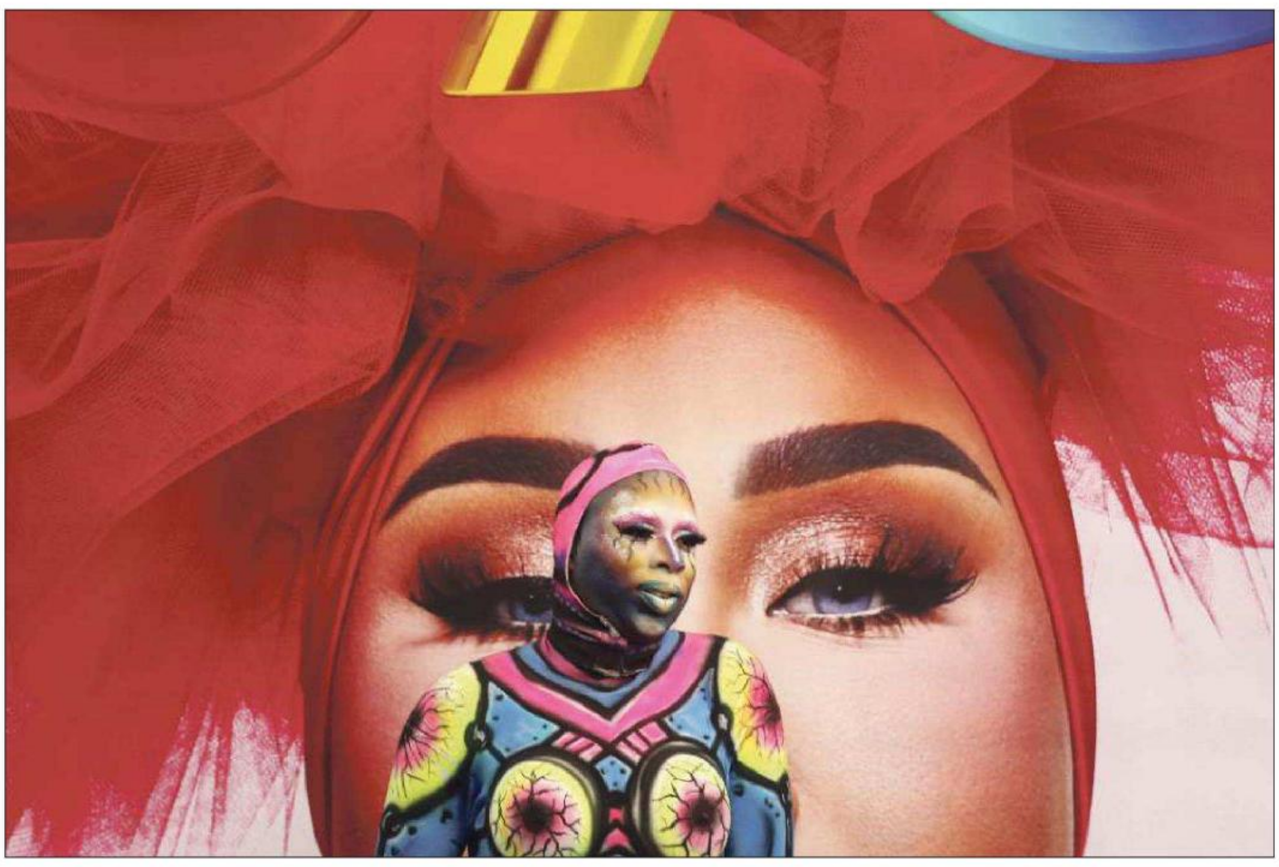
Residents ‘show our joy’ amid right-wing attacks



Photographs by Genaro Molina Los Angeles Times

DJ HONEY DAVENPORT attends WeHo Pride last week. This year’s Pride Month comes amid a national backlash, including lawmakers’ efforts to ban drag shows and restrict the rights of transgender people.

[Pride, from A1]

North Hollywood and Glendale over the teaching of gender and sexuality in schools. The L.A. Dodgers invited, then booted, then reinvited the Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence, a group of satirical nuns in drag, to its Pride Night.

For queer people in and around West Hollywood, the internationally known haven for LGBTQ+ culture and longtime home of L.A. Pride, the vitriol has been met with sadness and anger, but little surprise.

Amid the backlash, they say, Pride feels more relevant than ever.

“It may be a little bit passé for some of us who’ve been around a long time, but I have to say, every Pride I feel a sense of renewal. ... I see all these young people out celebrating in a way I don’t think I did at their age, and that gives me a lot of hope,” Heilman said.

Bamby Salcedo, president and chief executive of the TransLatin@ Coalition, said that with right-wing politicians seemingly using transgender people “as political pawns” to “gain votes and to cater to extremist people,” it feels especially important this year to be marching.

“If we focus on the negativity, that will bring us down,” said Salcedo, 53. “When we have these moments like Pride, we are ... able to show our joy to the world and our community so that they are able to understand that, regardless of the challenges we continue to experience, we find joy in whatever way possible.”

As Pride grew into a social — and financial — behemoth, fissures emerged.

This month, L.A. Pride and the newer WeHo Pride are taking place on back-to-back weekends, two miles apart — the result of years of tension between L.A. Pride’s parent organization, Christopher Street West, and the city of West Hollywood.

Critics said L.A. Pride, which at 53 is one of the nation’s oldest Pride parades, had become too corporate, the festival tickets too expensive. And there were widespread complaints that the organization and city were unwelcoming of queer people of color and transgender people.

So West Hollywood, which hosted L.A. Pride for four decades, launched its own parade and festival last year.

This year’s WeHo Pride wound along Santa Monica Boulevard last weekend. L.A. Pride will step off Sunday morning at Sunset Boulevard and Highland Avenue, about four blocks northeast of West Hollywood city limits.

Salcedo marched in WeHo Pride while dressed as a social justice warrior carrying a shield that read, “Invest in Trans Lives.” And she will be at the L.A. Pride Parade this weekend.

For the TransLatin@ Coalition, she said, Pride isn’t just a party. It’s a critical venue for passing out information about resources for queer people, about combating hate and about the prevention of COVID-19 and other diseases.

Gerald Garth, the board president for Christopher Street West, has been coming to L.A. Pride for a decade.

In 2013, Garth had just moved to Los Angeles from Louisiana. He hopped on a bus to West Hollywood alone, wearing a feather boa and a fedora with a rainbow-colored brim.

“In the body which I occupy, there has to be a great level of boldness to occupy it, as a tall, dark Black man,” said Garth, 40. “There’s a very prescribed experience which society has given him, and then you layer that with an LGBTQ+ experience.”

By the time he finished walking down Santa Monica Boulevard, Garth felt lighter. More joyful. It felt, he said, like he was “initiated into the rainbow.”

No matter what’s going on politically, first-timers are transformed by the Pride parade each year, Garth said.

With thousands of people on the streets, security is a top priority, organizers for both L.A. Pride and WeHo Pride said.

Increasingly, there is debate about the presence of armed law enforcement officers at Pride.

The LGBTQ+ community has a fraught history with police, who, for decades, raided gay bars such as the famed Stonewall Inn in New York and the Black Cat tavern in Silver Lake.

At WeHo Pride last weekend, Los Angeles County sheriff’s deputies arrested two volunteers at a booth for Equal Means Equal, a nonprofit that pushes for the adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

A video posted to Twitter shows at least six uniformed deputies wrestling LGBTQ+ activist Xodiac Rose and their friend Abby Thomas to the pavement.

“At Pride, oh, my God!” a bystander shouted.

“This is what we mean!” Rose, 25, screamed as they were being handcuffed. A deputy, Rose yelled, “was being homophobic” and laughing at signs at the booth.

In a statement, the Sheriff’s Department said Rose, who was in custody for four days, had an outstanding warrant on claims of battery, vandalism and robbing someone of a cellphone outside the West Hollywood Library in April.

Thomas, 28, was arrested on suspicion of “interfering and obstructing an arrest,” according to the Sheriff’s Department. She was released from custody hours later, and witnesses dispute the allegation.

MEMBERS OF Disney Pride at last week’s parade, which is separate from L.A. Pride events on Sunday.

Alice Crenshaw, a spokesperson for Equal Means Equal who witnessed the arrests and called them “extremely aggressive,” said the warrant against Rose stemmed from a protest outside a Drag Queen Story Hour event at the West Hollywood Library.

Videos posted on Twitter show Rose voguing in front of a man filming outside the library. Rose then stomped on a cellphone. A far-right website called Right Now Views — which includes videos of protests outside LGBTQ+ events — created a wanted poster with photos of Rose, the words “Tweaker Antifa” and a phone number for the Sheriff’s Department.

In an email, West Hollywood Mayor Sepi Shyne said it was “deeply disconcerting to see images of anyone being held on the pavement surrounded by deputies in gear” and “even more alarming when this takes place in our safe LGBTQ+ spaces.”

“Pride celebrations are supposed to be places where we as queer people feel empowered, affirmed, and safe,” she wrote. “We can’t lose sight of the fact that this is emblematic of a larger division in our nation right now.”

Shyne said she has heard from community members who want no law enforcement at Pride celebrations and from others who are grateful for added security during tense times. The city, she said, is working to “balance safety concerns, which is our responsibility during Pride, with the legitimate concerns of our LGBTQ community members who have had difficult relationships with law enforcement in the past.”

Shyne, 46, who is Iranian American and the first queer woman of color elected to the City Council, said Pride is essential.

“In Iran, LGBTQ people are given the death sentence, so there are no Pride celebrations,” she wrote.

“Pride events, with all their public displays of flair, flamboyance, and fun are vital — because someone somewhere, even in a City like West Hollywood, still may believe they would be better off dead than be LGBTQ. We can’t let that happen.”

On Santa Monica Boulevard in West Hollywood this week, people were reveling in Pride Month, with all its rainbow flags and ribald humor.

A banner on the window of Hugo’s Restaurant read: #dragisnotacrime. A sign in the window of the West Hollywood Library promoting Drag Queen Story Hour advertised “Fake Eyelashes, Real News.” Giant ads with muscular men wearing skimpy swim trunks and stethoscopes promoted an HIV-prevention drug with the words: “I Ho, You Ho, WeHo ... together on PrEP.”

At the Gallery at Circus of Books, Jesús Clauss, 42, a studio manager for fashion designer Julia Clancey, adjusted displays for her Pride collection, arranging “budgie smugglers” — briefs-style swim bottoms — with colorful banana prints and shimmery kaftans.

Clauss, of Koreatown, went to WeHo Pride at his husband’s urging. He initially resisted because, as a younger gay man, he felt a lot of pressure to “have a certain physique.”

But his husband told him: “Let’s make our own memories.” He came away inspired, especially by younger queer people who “are not as concerned about appearance.”

The same weekend, his niece came out as pansexual by posting on Instagram that she was “living my truth.” She had faced some resistance from loved ones. He shared his own experiences as a queer person and told her he supported her.

The national backlash against LBGTQ+ people is frustrating, Clauss said. But ultimately, things are so much better than when he was discovering his sexuality, without access to the internet or much information at all.

“It seems like the rhetoric,” he said, “is a result of all the progress we’ve made.”

JAMES WATT, 1938 - 2023

Blunt, pro-development Interior secretary under Reagan

By Mead Gruver

James Watt, the Reagan administration’s sharp-tongued, pro-development Interior secretary who was beloved by conservatives but ran afoul of environmentalists, Beach Boys fans and eventually the president, has died. He was 85.

Watt died in Arizona on May 27, his son Eric Watt said in a statement Thursday.

In an administration divided between so-called pragmatists and hard-liners, few stood as far to the right at the time as Watt, who once labeled the environmental movement as “preservation vs. people” and the general public as a clash between “liberals and Americans.”

In that sense, Watt foreshadowed combative Interior secretaries in the Trump administration, Ryan Zinke and David Bernhardt, who, like Watt, aggressively pushed to grant oil, gas and coal leases on public land, increase offshore drilling and limit expansion of national parks and monuments.

“While no one’s death should be celebrated, he was the worst of MAGA before it was invented,” tweeted David Donger of the environmental group Natural Resources Defense Council, referring to former President Trump’s “Make America Great Again” slogan.

Watt and his supporters saw him as an upholder of President Reagan’s core conservative values, but opponents were alarmed by his policies and offended by his comments.

In 1981, shortly after he was appointed, the Sierra Club collected more than 1 million signatures seeking Watt’s ouster and criticized such actions as clear-cutting federal lands in the Pacific Northwest, weakening environmental regulations for strip mining and hampering efforts to curtail air pollution in California’s Yosemite Valley.

With his bald head and thick glasses, he became the rare Interior secretary recognizable to the general public, for reasons beyond the environment. He characterized members of a coal advisory panel using derogatory language and in 1983 tried to ban music from Fourth of July festivities on the National Mall, saying it attracted the “wrong element.”

The Beach Boys had been recent mall headliners, and their fans included Reagan and his wife, Nancy. With Watt’s statement facing widespread mockery, the Reagans invited the Beach Boys for a special White House visit. Watt, meanwhile, was summoned to receive a plaster model of a foot with a hole in it.

In his 1985 book “The Courage of a Conservative,” Watt wrote that the controversy “actually arose because I was a conservative. Members of a liberal press saw an opportunity to create a controversy by censoring the facts and avoiding the real issues.”

He said the initial stories about the rock music ban “only mentioned that the Beach Boys had performed in the past. Yet before we knew what was happening, banner headlines proclaimed that I had banned the Beach Boys. I was astonished.”

Cutting regulations was his primary mission. Between the time he was confirmed as Interior secretary in 1981 until he resigned under pressure in 1983, Watt implemented an offshore leasing program that offered virtually the entire U.S. coastline for oil and gas drilling and held the largest coal lease sale in history, auctioning off 1.1 billion tons of coal in the Powder River Basin of Montana and Wyoming.

Watt tripled the amount of onshore land being leased for oil and gas exploration and doubled the acreage leased for geothermal resources.

Watt spent $1 billion to restore and improve national parks and added 2,800 square miles to the nation’s wilderness system. And his efforts to exploit natural resources made America stronger, he wrote to Reagan in October 1983.

“Our excellent record for managing the natural resources of this land is unequaled — because we put people in the environmental equation,” Watt wrote.

But eight days after writing to the president, he rode horseback into a cow pasture down the road from Reagan’s California ranch to announce his resignation. He was succeeded by a longtime Reagan aide, William Clark.

Associated Press

POLARIZING FIGURE
Conservatives loved James Watt, but the Reagan aide riled green activists and Beach Boys fans.

“I had outworn my usefulness,” Watt said of his decision, adding that others “wouldn’t get off my case” about his insulting coal advisory panel comment.

Watt was born Jan. 31, 1938, in Lusk, Wyo., and his family later moved to Wheatland, Wyo., where his father practiced law. He attended the University of Wyoming, graduating in 1960 and obtaining a law degree two years later.

In 1962, Watt became a personal assistant to former Gov. Milward L. Simpson and went to Washington after Simpson was elected to the U.S. Senate later that year. From 1966 to 1969, he helped develop policies on such issues as pollution, mining, public lands and energy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, then in early 1969 he joined the Nixon administration as an Interior Department undersecretary.

In 1975, President Ford appointed him to the Federal Power Commission.

While Jimmy Carter was president, Watt worked in the private sector as president and chief legal officer of the pro-development Mountain States Legal Foundation in Denver.

He did consulting work after leaving the Reagan administration, at one point representing Native American tribes in oil operations and hotel developments after previously labeling Indigenous reservations “the failure of socialism.” He also accepted six-figure consulting fees to represent developers of a federally subsidized housing project.

He moved back to Wyoming in 1986 and set up a law office in Jackson, taught at his alma mater and served as a legal consultant and speaker.

His consulting work involving federal housing money came under scrutiny in the late 1980s when an investigation was launched into corruption in the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

In 1996, he pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor for withholding documents from a grand jury investigating HUD. He was fined $5,000, put on five years’ probation and ordered to perform community service. He said he had “made a serious mistake” and hoped to “get on with a constructive role in society.”

Over the years, Watt expressed fears that unless they were stopped, radical environmental movements like Earth First! would persuade the “cowards of Congress” to ban all hunting, eliminate all logging and livestock grazing on public lands and further jeopardize the minerals industries.

He lived in his later years in Wickenburg, Ariz., with his wife, Leilani.

Gruver writes for the Associated Press.

‘Save the children’ has an all-too-familiar ring to it

Anti-LGBTQ+ hate, though couched in rhetoric about protecting kids, is a page from an old yet powerful playbook.

ANITA CHABRIA
REPORTING FROM SACRAMENTO

Leave our kids alone. Defend families. Save the children.

Parents shouted slogans like these in Glendale, North Hollywood, Temecula and even on the steps of the state Capitol in recent days, fervid in a hate that many in California thought was a thing of the past.

But as Sister Roma, she of the much-maligned Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence, told me when we sat down for a few minutes Monday, it's not really the parents who are fomenting the hate — and everything old is new again anyway. Leg warmers, for example, are back.

"They are clinging with white-knuckle fear to the last bit of power they have," Roma said of the far-right agitators, just as ultraconservatives did the last time California tried to clear its schools of anything hinting at gender diversity.

More than 75 laws outlawing a range of gender-related issues — from talking about sexuality in classrooms to holding drag performances in public — have been passed by statehouses nationwide this year. Republican standard-bearers including Ron DeSantis, Donald Trump, Ted Cruz and Marjorie Taylor Greene have made anti-LGBTQ+ hate their brand, and there is real concern that our current Supreme Court will overturn Obergefell vs. Hodges, the landmark 2015 case that legalized same-sex marriage nationwide.

Hard to believe it's 2023, especially because California has been here, done this, circa 1978 with the Briggs Initiative, also known as Proposition 6. That's when voters considered giving school boards the power to fire gay and lesbian teachers and anyone who openly supported gay rights.

The Briggs Initiative, named for then-state Sen. John Briggs, a conservative from Orange County, also pitted LBGTQ+ rights against parental rights. The initiative posited that allowing gay and lesbian teachers in classrooms was a danger to kids, because such educators would "recruit" students into their "lifestyles."

"I don't understand why we have to send our children to sit in front of a homosexual teacher for eight hours," this newspaper reported Briggs saying in July 1977. "We can't risk our children."

Panel faults LAPD officers in shooting

Four were within policy in fatal South L.A. encounter, but six others were not.

BY LIBOR JANY

Several L.A. police officers were justified when they shot at and killed a man who brandished a handgun, but six of their colleagues broke department policy by joining in the barrage of gunfire last July, according to a police oversight panel.

The civilian Police Commission found late last month that four of the 10 officers — Luis Avalos, Garrett Vanhooser, Christopher Gonzalez and Chad Heistermann — who opened fire on Rudolfo Torres were within policy. The commission voted at that time to approve a report by Police Chief Michel Moore, summarizing an internal investigation of the incident.

But the chief's report found that the deadly force used by the rest of the officers who opened fire during the confrontation a year ago — Christopher Burke, Jose Rodriguez, Kyle Bender, James Stea, Israel Florez and Chad Fillinger — "was not proportional, objectively reasonable, or necessary."

In fact, the report on Torres' death weighed whether the incident might have been a case of "contagious fire" — a phenomenon in which an officer mistakes colleagues' shots as coming from a suspect, prompting them to open fire.

In all, 31 shots were discharged, with officers firing one to five shots each, the report said. Some officers who were present did not fire.

While acknowledging the shooting unfolded amid "a difficult situation," Moore wrote in a report that the designated cover officers at the scene were "better positioned to address the lethal threat" than some of the officers who ultimately fired. During such encounters, only certain officers are assigned the role of cover officers.

Forced labor, sex abuse at ‘wellness’ company, feds say

OneTaste founder Nicole Daedone, who remains at large, and sales exec are indicted.

BY NOAH GOLDBERG

The founder and a former executive of OneTaste, a San Francisco-based "sexuality-focused wellness education" company that grabbed national media attention, were indicted on charges of conspiring to force employees to work for them by inflicting sexual, psychological and economic abuse, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

Nicole Daedone, 56, the founder and spiritual leader of OneTaste, and Rachel Cherwitz, 43, who served as head of sales, used "a series of abusive and manipulative tactics" to get volunteers and employees to perform work for them from 2004 to 2018, prosecutors said.

They were charged in federal court in Brooklyn, according to the U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of New York. Cherwitz was arrested Tuesday in San Francisco, while Daedone remains at large, a law enforcement source said.

OneTaste rose to prominence for its focus on women's pleasure, offering courses in "orgasmic meditation," during which gloved men would bring women to climax with their fingers, according to reports on the group.

But according to federal investigators, the sexual liberation and healing OneTaste offered were a smokescreen behind which Daedone and Cherwitz manipulated and controlled members, driving them into debt with expensive courses while surveilling them and keeping dossiers of their personal information.

In addition to San Francisco, the company operated in New York, Los Angeles, Denver, Las Vegas and other U.S. cities.

L.A. apologizes for city's role in Zoot Suit riots

The brutal attacks on young Latino, Filipino and Black Angelenos occurred 80 years ago.

BY REBECCA ELLIS

In the very chamber where Los Angeles City Council members once debated banning zoot suits, city leaders formally apologized Friday for the role the city government played in fueling the brutal attacks on young Latino, Filipino and Black Angelenos that played out across the city eight decades ago.

The apology comes exactly 80 years after the dark chapter in city history where mobs of white servicemen — joined by police officers and civilians — roamed the city instigating brutal attacks on minority youths. The indiscriminate violence was dubbed the "Zoot Suit riots," named for the baggy suits popular among the young people at the time.

"The city of L.A. can finally take responsibility and apologize for its role effectively sanctioning the violence perpetuated eight decades ago," said Councilmember Kevin de León, who introduced a council resolution last month condemning the riots.

The council celebrated the historic apology Friday with zoot suit-clad dancers and remarks from De León and community leaders, who praised the apology as a necessary step in highlighting the role the city played in the weeklong riots.

"You had young boys — as young as 12 years of age — who were violently beaten, they were stripped of their clothes," De León said. "Acts that exposed deep-seated racism that targeted Latinos. And just as disgraceful, back in the day, were the actions of our Police Department, the LAPD, and the City Council."

The advertisements spring to life with bright colors and smiling, young women, usually Black or Latina, celebrating the arrival of desperately needed cash.

"Cha-ching!" the website of one smartphone app says, displaying a curly-haired mother and child who look to be jumping for joy. "It's payday all day, everyday." Funds are available "in minutes" to help pay for groceries, rent and family celebrations without "mandatory fees" or interest, it says.

Another app features a photo array of six female workers and one man laboring in call centers, nursing homes, restaurants and retail. "Pay bills on time, with no late fees, no overdraft fees and no need for payday loans," it says.

A third app, backed by actor Ashton Kutcher and NBA star Kevin Durant, advertises with a TikTok video in which a young Black woman is approached while walking down the street. "What if I told you I could get you some money right now?" she's asked. Seconds later, when she has it, she exclaims: "Oh, my God!"

To migrant children, she's their superstar

Estefanía Rebellón, an actor and founder of Yes We Can, knows education can be key.

ALEJANDRO MACIEL

DANIA MAXWELL Los Angeles Times

ESTEFANÍA REBELLÓN, director of the organization Yes We Can, greets students in a classroom that was created inside a bus in Tijuana. "We always need volunteers to help us, the work is never done," Rebellón says.

When she starred as one of two sisters crossing the border through the Sonoran desert in the film "On the Other Side," actress Estefanía Rebellón had her first experience of what thousands of people in search of the American dream face.

But cinema is one thing, and reality another thing entirely.

When she was 10 years old and living in Cali, Colombia, her parents came to her school one day to pick her up earlier than usual. They told her they were going to leave the country because they were under death threats from the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), the left-wing guerrilla group that for decades waged a civil war against the government that left hundreds of thousands dead over more than a half-century.

"The only thing I was able to take was a toy," recalls Rebellón. "I arrived in Miami with what I was wearing."

Seeking to fulfill her dream of being an actress, Rebellón left Florida and moved to Los Angeles, where she began a promising career in the world of film and television. By 2017, she had written, directed and acted in several films and series, such as "Grachi" (2011), "Husband for Rent" (2013) and "Jane the Virgin."

But in 2018, when the migratory flow reached a crisis point, and dozens of migrant caravans from Central America arrived at the U.S.-Mexico border, her glamorous life in Hollywood turned upside down. Something told her that she had to go to Tijuana and see what was happening up close.

And she didn't think twice.

In Los Angeles, together with her partner, Kyle Thomas Schmidt, an actor, director and stuntman, she formed the organization Yes We Can, and in less than three months they had purchased a school bus and converted it into a school that was placed on the grounds of the Pro Amore Dei hostel in Tijuana.

The question is unavoidable: Why a school?

"When I arrived from Colombia, everything changed from one day to the next and the only place where I felt safe was at school," she tells me with a touch of nostalgia for those difficult days of her childhood. "That's why a school in Tijuana was a way to make life a little easier for these children who have had to go through so many difficulties."

When I visited the Yes We Can school in Tijuana, I met teacher Clarisa Carrasco, who, amid the noise of the classroom, played soft music, as if for meditation, and asked the children to "breathe in, and out," as she slowly raised and lowered her arms.

The effect was immediate. The uproar gradually turned into a silence that was only broken by the delicate music. "Now drop all thoughts, just focus on your breathing."

Amid all the stress the children experience, school offers them a bit of stability, Carrasco, who has extensive experience working with migrant children from Latin America, told me.

Here at this school, everyone, children and adults, has a story to tell.

Like the 5-year-old Guatemalan girl who hugs a huge teddy bear while describing, in minute detail, her experience of staying in the immigration detention center, known as the "ice box"; the cold she feels when she sleeps with an aluminum blanket, and the little pain she felt in her chest when immigration authorities separated her from her mother.

Or Isabel, a Guatemalan girl with beautiful light-brown eyes who left her town when armed men attacked her neighbors' houses.

The dynamic within the school is similar to that of other educational systems. There are two instructors who teach different subjects bilingually. The children start activities at 9 in the morning and at 11 they take a break for breakfast. The day ends at 1 in the afternoon.

In 2021, the Yes We Can Mobile Schools program turned 2 years old. "We were very surprised to see that, despite the global confinement due to the pandemic, thousands and thousands of families continued to migrate, making schools increasingly necessary," Rebellón says.

Between 2020 and 2021 Yes We Can opened two new schools with the same model in the states of Baja California and Chihuahua.

The impact has been so great that the Ministry of Public Education of Mexico granted official recognition to its study plans, thus making it the first bilingual academic program for migrant children.

Major achievements

In July, Yes We Can will turn 4 years old and will be starting the construction of a new bus in Los Angeles that will be used as a school in one of the border cities. "We always need volunteers to help us, the work is never done," Rebellón says with a laugh.

What this young actress has accomplished through organizing Yes We Can in four years is impressive. Here are some data:

She has provided education and enrolled more than 2,800 immigrant and refugee children in her Mobile School Program.

She has provided more than 2 million hours of education to children in crisis.

She has built four school spaces on the border between the United States and Mexico, two in Tijuana, one in Mexicali, and one in Ciudad Juárez.

The organization currently operates three school spaces, two in Tijuana and one in Ciudad Juárez.

It has developed its own curriculum for working with refugee and immigrant children and has developed specialized courses for children in crisis and migrants.

The schools serve more than 300 students daily between the ages of 3 and 15, and offer education for prekindergarten, kindergarten, primary grades from first to fifth grade and sixth to eighth grade.

The schools work with children of 10 different nationalities including those from Mexico, Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Venezuela, Colombia, Haiti, Brazil, and U.S.-born children whose parents have been deported.

Yes We Can has handed out more than 2,800 new backpacks with school kits and has provided more than 2,800 uniforms to children enrolled in its programs.

All that work has given Rebellón great satisfaction. In 2023 she was named Woman of the Year by the Women's March LA Foundation. In 2021 she was nominated for the Alfonso García Robles Humanitarian Award by the National Autonomous University of Mexico for the defense, promotion, protection and guarantee of the human rights of immigrants who are in a condition of vulnerability.

A pleasant surprise

In June 2022, Rebellón received a direct message from Alejandro N. Mayorkas, director of the Department of Homeland Security, and her heart jumped in her chest. It's not every day you get calls like this.

The message was simple: The United States government wanted to inform her that she had been named an "Outstanding American" for her work leading the Yes We Can organization.

How does it feel to get recognition like that? Rebellón remains very serious as she tells me, "This is a recognition to my family, to the migrants, and to all of us who have come to this country and have contributed to making it bigger and more prosperous."

And although in recent years she has been focused on how the lifting of Title 42 is affecting global immigration, she has not put aside her dream of being an actress.

"But I'm not going to lose myself in the glamour and elegance of Hollywood," she tells me with conviction. "I have a conscience and I am consistent with what I believe, so I will continue fighting for each of my dreams, no matter how difficult they may seem."

Officers faulted in shooting

the majority of an internal review board that concluded a supervisor at the scene, Sgt. Burke, didn't need to fire his service weapon and would have been better served by staying back and assigning clear roles to the other officers.

Though it concluded that the four officers' shots were in policy, the board took into account the "number of officers that discharged their service pistols, as well as the number of rounds fired," according to Moore's report.

The shooting occurred on the night of July 2, 2022, when Newton Division gang officers encountered Torres in the area of 37th Street and Maple Avenue.

While speaking to Torres, who appeared to be under the influence of drugs, officers became convinced he was armed and ordered him to take his hands out of his pockets, police said. Further raising their suspicions, officers said, Torres was acting fidgety and was wearing an oversized, baggy sweatshirt on a warm night.

According to the chief's report, one of the officers recognized Torres from a previous run-in as a member of the 36th Street gang who went by the nickname "Marbles." The decades-old gang operates in the surrounding area, which is sometimes called the "Low Bottoms," police said.

When they ordered him to stop, Torres ignored the command and started walking away, prompting a surreal, slow-motion pursuit through nearby streets, with officers trailing several feet behind and using a patrol vehicle as cover.

After following Torres on foot for several blocks, officers tried to apprehend him. Edited police body camera video shows that officers shot him once with a hard foam projectile, sending him tumbling. As he fell, a gun he had apparently been holding under his coat clattered to the ground, according to the report. When he picked it back up, the officers opened fire, the report says.

Officers involved gave differing accounts of whether they saw Torres point the gun in their direction or simply raise it.

The 30-year-old was pronounced dead at a hospital.

"Regardless of whether Torres was raising the handgun or pointing it, the board opined that it was reasonable for the officers to believe that he had the present ability, opportunity, and apparent intent to immediately cause death or serious bodily injury to them and that his action had to be instantly confronted and addressed," Moore wrote in his report.

According to the report, police recovered a loaded .40-caliber pistol with no serial number and an extended magazine with 31 bullets. They also recovered another extended magazine, a .9mm, AR-style pistol and a 50-round drum magazine inside a backpack Torres was carrying.

Though the chief's report concluded that some officers were justified in using deadly force against an armed suspect, it disapproved of some of the tactics employed leading up to the shooting.

Some of the officers who fired should have sought cover behind the patrol vehicle's bulletproof doors, the report said. Other officers were cited for occasionally placing their fingers on the trigger of their guns — in violation of department policy that dictates officers should do so only when prepared to fire.

Echoing the review board, the report also faulted Burke for failing to take an "active leadership role." Instead, the report said, the sergeant seemed "overly involved in Torres' actions, which seemed to limit his ability to effectively manage his personnel."

Toxicology results from an autopsy found the presence of alcohol, amphetamine and methamphetamine in Torres' blood, according to the report.

Since the shooting, relatives of Torres have continued to question the officers' motive for the stop.

Since the shooting, Torres' brother, Javier, said he has heard from neighborhood residents who said his brother's death was part of a larger pattern of profiling and harassment by Newton Division officers.

"There's been a continuous targeting of Latino and African Americans in this community," said Javier Torres, a high school teacher in Oakland. "It has been nonstop and I think since my brother's killing, his murder by LAPD, we have seen many, many murders" by police.

Even though his brother was armed, Javier Torres said police could have done more to defuse the situation. His brother should have been arrested and "put through the process" rather than killed, he said.

He also questioned why officers fired so many shots in the encounter.

LAPD officials said during a presentation in April before the Police Commission that they have tried to address high-volume gunfire incidents by restricting the number of officers who can have their guns drawn during an encounter with a suspect.

Deputy Chief Marc Reina told commissioners at the time that the department is developing a new virtual reality training course for officers intended to "re-create" the stress levels of firing their weapons in a fast-changing environment where they have to account for countless factors.

In a separate investigation, the department late last month also cleared two officers who shot and killed an armed man in Pacoima last June after he allegedly tried to force someone out of a car at gunpoint.

Officers Christopher Kliebert and Andrew Mejia were justified in using deadly force against 24-year-old Oscar Santiago, who brandished a gun at police a short time after the attempted carjacking. Police released video from the encounter.

A review board concluded that another officer in Kliebert's and Mejia's shoes would have also considered Santiago a threat, after he raised a gun in their direction.

Police initially said that Santiago fired first, but a subsequent investigation revealed that officers were the first to shoot, according to a report.

Abuse charges for OneTaste

[OneTaste, from B1]

the defendants are alleged to have sought complete control over their employees' lives, including by driving them into debt and directing them to perform sexual acts while also withholding wages," said Breon Peace, the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York. "This prosecution should serve as a reminder to both employer and employee that no matter the marketing mantra, this conduct is never acceptable."

OneTaste and its philosophy propelled Daedone to semi-celebrity status. In a 2011 TEDx talk in San Francisco, she preached the gospel of the female orgasm.

"Female orgasm is vital for every single woman on the planet," she said. "It roots our fundamental capacity for connection."

Daedone said she founded OneTaste after a man taught her about orgasmic meditation and brought her to tears by shining a flashlight on her genitals and describing their appearance.

However, Daedone was less focused on the pleasure of OneTaste's members, prosecutors said.

"Cherwitz and Daedone promoted a philosophy and ethos based at the worship of 'Orgasm' in which Daedone played a central role," prosecutors wrote in court documents. "Cherwitz, Daedone, and other leaders in the OneTaste community demanded absolute commitment to Daedone, including by exalting Daedone's teachings and ideology."

OneTaste targeted people who had suffered sexual abuse or trauma, saying the group could help with healing, prosecutors said. With Daedone as chief executive from 2004 to 2017, the company separated members from their relationships with outsiders and moved them to new locations, according to federal prosecutors. Once in the group, OneTaste employees and members were required by Daedone to perform "uncomfortable or repulsive" sexual acts, according to the indictment.

> 'Under the guise of empowerment and wellness, the defendants are alleged to have sought complete control over their employees' lives.'
> — U.S. ATTY. BREON PEACE

Daedone and Cherwitz are also accused of grooming employees to have sex with potential investors and clients of OneTaste, according to the indictment.

All the while, Daedone and Cherwitz used employees' services while often failing to pay them what they were owed, prosecutors said.

OneTaste's rise spawned positive as well as negative attention. A 2009 profile in the New York Times brought the company recognition but was followed by nightmare stories from former members who described it as cult-like.

The BBC in 2020 released a 10-episode podcast on OneTaste; Daedone and Cherwitz joined a lawsuit over the podcast in a failed libel action. Last year, Netflix released a documentary about the company, "Orgasm Inc: The Story of OneTaste."

Longest-serving California worker dies

May Lee, who built 'irreplaceable institutional knowledge' over nearly 80 years, was 102

By Summer Lin

California's oldest and longest-serving state employee has died at age 102 after nearly eight decades on the job.

May Lee was a few weeks shy of her birthday when she died May 26, according to Jennifer Iida, a spokesperson for the California Department of General Services. Lee worked for the state for 79 years, starting in accounting at the Department of Finance in 1943, then switching to the Department of General Services when it was created in 1963.

After retiring from the Department of General Services in the 1980s, Lee worked as a retired annuitant until last year, meaning she was rehired onto the payroll as a part-time worker while drawing retirement benefits.

"We will greatly miss her enthusiastic and cheerful disposition along with her irreplaceable institutional knowledge," Iida said in a statement. "She was an inspiration to us all."

Lee was honored by Gov. Gavin Newsom during Older Americans Month in 2019, when she was 99, for being the longest-serving state employee.

She was credited with saving millions of dollars through revenue-generating measures, finding accounting errors and cutting costs. She also wrote sections of the California Government Code.

A relative of Lee's did not respond to a request for comment.

In a 2021 interview with the San Diego Union-Tribune, Lee said she would work until she could not anymore, pointing to her brother, who worked until he died at age 85.

Her longevity was thanks to "good genes and keeping busy," she told the Union-Tribune, adding that she maintained a healthy diet of fish, chicken, vegetables, very few processed foods and no fried food.

A party for her 100th birthday with about 2,000 people invited was canceled because of the COVID-19 pandemic.

The next year, colleagues took her out to lunch and brought a cake for her 101st birthday. It had one candle, a symbol of the start of a new century.

L.A. moves 'sanctuary city' law forward

Irfan Khan Los Angeles Times

L.A. CITY Councilmembers Hugo Soto-Martinez, left, Eunisses Hernandez and Nithya Raman brought forward the "sanctuary city" motion earlier this year.

By Dakota Smith

The Los Angeles City Council on Friday voted to toughen policies around the use of city resources for federal immigration enforcement.

On a 12-0 vote, the council asked city attorneys to write a new law that would bar city personnel or resources from being used for immigration enforcement. The law would also bar federal authorities or other entities connected to immigration enforcement from accessing city databases or anyone's personal data.

City Councilmembers Bob Blumenfield and John Lee were absent from Friday's vote.

L.A.'s proposal, referred by council members as a "sanctuary city" law, would essentially codify existing policies, including a 2017 executive directive issued by then-Mayor Eric Garcetti.

If passed, the law would be similar to one in San Francisco. That law prohibits city employees from using city funds or resources to assist U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers in the enforcement of federal immigration laws unless such assistance is required by federal or state law.

The council on Friday also asked for a report back that details any "current gaps" between LAPD Special Order No. 40, which prohibits police officers from initiating contact with anyone for the sole purpose of learning their immigration status, and Garcetti's 2017 directive. The council also asked for a report on instances when city departments have assisted ICE.

Those reports are intended to answer outstanding questions about the city's existing policies.

The motion voted on Friday by the council says that policies allow ICE officers to access city jails to interrogate people in LAPD custody. The motion also states that Los Angeles Police Department officers are permitted to transfer individuals to ICE custody, even when judicial warrants are not issued.

On Friday, however, the LAPD disputed such claims.

Capt. Anthony Otero, assistant commanding officer of the LAPD's Custody Services Division, said the department doesn't allow ICE to enter LAPD jails to interrogate people. Otero also said the department doesn't transfer people into ICE custody without a judicial warrant. Describing the LAPD's relationship with the federal agency, Otero said ICE will "fax us holds on occasion for persons we have in custody, at which point we follow our polices."

Asked to describe its "policies," the LAPD didn't immediately provide an answer to The Times.

An ICE spokesperson declined to comment Friday on the "sanctuary city" proposal, saying that the agency doesn't comment on pending legislation.

The "sanctuary city" motion was brought forward earlier this year by Councilmembers Nithya Raman, Eunisses Hernandez and Hugo Soto-Martínez. It was seconded by Councilmembers Curren Price and Heather Hutt.

Some of their colleagues asked for more clarity about the city's policies at a March City Council committee hearing on the motion.

Councilmember Monica Rodriguez, who represents the northeast San Fernando Valley, said at that meeting she was "confused" by suggestions that local government is cooperating with ICE. "But more importantly, the suggestion that the city hasn't already adopted these principles," she said.

Rodriguez also said at that meeting there had been "unintended consequences" because of the city's policies around immigration.

She said that when President Biden took office, the city attempted to participate in the reunification of children who had been separated from their immigrant families, but it had to leave that work to L.A. County.

"We were unable to participate because of the policies that we had adopted," Rodriguez said.

Senate Bill 54, California's so-called sanctuary state law, passed in 2017. In 2019, the City Council passed a resolution declaring L.A. a "city of sanctuary," but the move had no legal teeth.

After L.A. city attorneys draft the ordinance supported by council members at Friday's meeting, it will return to the council for a vote.

Juneteenth will be a holiday for all city workers

Council votes to make the commemoration of the end of slavery a permanent day off.

By Julia Wick

The Los Angeles City Council voted Friday to establish Juneteenth as a permanent paid holiday for city employees, a year after then-Mayor Eric Garcetti signed a proclamation creating the holiday.

Juneteenth celebrates the end of slavery in the United States. The holiday commemorates the events of June 19, 1865, when Union soldiers arrived in Galveston, Texas, bringing news of freedom to Black slaves two months after the end of the Civil War and 2½ years after the signing of the Emancipation Proclamation.

President Biden in 2021 signed legislation making Juneteenth a federal holiday.

Garcetti's resolution came two years after Councilmembers Curren D. Price and Marqueece Harris-Dawson and former Councilmember Herb J. Wesson introduced a proposal in July 2020 to explore making Juneteenth a city holiday.

The two votes taken by the City Council on Friday deal with the minutiae of holiday rules for tens of thousands of employees. One vote will amend the Los Angeles Administrative Code to add Juneteenth as a holiday for "nonrepresented" employees, those who don't have union bargaining agreements with the city. The council also voted to approve contract amendments recognizing Juneteenth as a holiday for workers with nearly two dozen unions representing city employees.

"We negotiated it with all of our unions to make the holiday permanent citywide," City Administrative Officer Matt Szabo said.

Juneteenth will be observed every year on June 19; if that day falls on a weekend, the holiday will be observed on Friday or Monday, as specified in the Administrative Code and individual labor agreements.

Those who work on the holiday "shall be compensated consistent with the provisions of their" memoranda of understanding, according to an email sent to employees by Dana H. Brown, general manager of the city's Personnel Department.

Victim of serial killer is ID'd after 25 years

By Noah Goldberg

For 25 years, one of at least four women murdered by Wayne Adam Ford in California remained unidentified.

The admitted serial killer turned himself in to authorities in November 1998, carrying a Bible and the severed body part of one of his victims in a plastic bag. He confessed to strangling the woman whose body part he carried into the Eureka sheriff's station, as well as three others — including one whose name he did not know.

Police searched missing persons reports for decades trying to identify the unknown victim of Ford, a long-haul trucker who had served in the Marine Corps. It wasn't until advances in DNA sequencing that the Humboldt County Sheriff's Office's new Cold Case Unit was finally able to find the woman's close relatives and put a name to the long-unidentified Jane Doe: Kerry Ann Cummings.

Her dismembered torso was found in the Ryan Slough, a stream that feeds into Arcata Bay near Eureka. Additional remains were found at Clam Beach in Humboldt County.

To identify Cummings, investigators sent the victim's DNA to a lab, which sequenced it and built a DNA profile, according to the Sheriff's Office. Using investigative genetic genealogy — a process by which researchers build family trees using DNA databases as well as traditional methods such as newspapers and obituaries — investigators found a close relative of the victim.

When asked whether they had any missing relatives, the family member said Cummings had been missing since the mid-1990s. Investigators then found Cummings' sister, Kathie Cummings, who provided a DNA sample that confirmed Ford's unidentified victim was Kerry Ann Cummings.

Cummings, 26, went missing in 1997. She was suffering from untreated mental health issues, her family told police. She told her family she was couch surfing in Oregon and refused to come home.

"Kerry was beautiful, funny, smart and an artist. She was great at making us laugh," her sister told investigators. "It is devastating what mental illness can do in a span of only two short years."

No missing persons report was ever taken on Cummings, though her family said they tried numerous times in Oregon and Arizona.

"Unfortunately, back then they were told that Kerry was an adult, that she had chosen the lifestyle, and that if she wasn't a threat to herself or others, there was nothing that [law enforcement] could do," her sister said to investigators. "As the internet expanded, I took to searching the [National Missing and Unidentified Persons System] website when I was missing her, scanning for mention of her tattoo and searching through the pictures of the Jane Does. She was dearly loved."

Ford was convicted in 2006 in San Bernardino County of four counts of first-degree murder, including for the killing of then-unidentified Cummings.

Slogan's an excuse for anti-LGBTQ+ hate

[Chabria, from B1]

Sound familiar?

"Save the children" is nothing new — just a recycled attack, dusted off and freshened up for another generation and supercharged through the QAnon conduit of social media to serve the purposes of a far-right intent on undermining democracy and maintaining the shaky status quo of power. Remember when we were supposed to be saving the children from the adrenochrome-drinking Democrats ritually abusing them underneath a D.C. pizza parlor?

If those who oppose diversity can't outright try to ban the humans this time, they will ban the ideas, purposefully riling up supporters by conflating inclusion with indoctrination, and "grooming" with existing. Because really, who doesn't want to save the children if the threat feels real?

Just like now, the whole Briggs mess back then emanated from Florida — specifically in Dade County, where Anita Bryant, a pop singer better known for her role as the spokeswoman for the Florida Citrus Commission, in 1977 spearheaded a "Save the Children" campaign to repeal a law that protected gay and lesbian people from job and housing discrimination. She successfully argued that she had a right to control "the moral atmosphere in which my children grow up."

Her campaign was a backlash to a decade of expanding recognition of gay civil rights after the Stonewall riots in 1969. It sparked a national movement that Briggs picked up on, with Bryant's help.

While Bryant's campaign was successful, it fueled a fierce response from California's LGBTQ+ community. On the night Bryant's ordinance passed in Florida, politician Harvey Milk, then a young member of the San Francisco Board of Supervisors, led a protest of thousands down Castro Street.

After the Briggs Initiative made it onto the California ballot, collecting hundreds of thousands of signatures, Milk was among its most vocal critics. In a memorable speech on the steps of San Francisco's City Hall, he spoke of the need to keep California a place of hope and acceptance.

"(T)he young gay people in the Altoona, Pennsylvanias, and the Richmond, Minnesotas, who are coming out and hear Anita Bryant on television and her story. The only thing they have to look forward to is hope," Milk said. "And you have to give them hope. Hope for a better world, hope for a better tomorrow, hope for a better place to come to if the pressures at home are too great. Hope that all will be all right."

That's the Harvey Milk whose legacy was recently debased by board members in the Temecula Valley Unified School District, where a conservative majority refused to adopt a new social studies curriculum because Milk was mentioned in a few pages of history materials.

That is what erasure means: not allowing future generations to believe in hope for the oppressed, making them feel alone and wrong. Gov. Gavin Newsom and state Atty. Gen. Rob Bonta announced Wednesday that they are investigating Temecula's action as a possible violation of state law.

The Briggs Initiative was ultimately defeated by more than a million votes, despite initial polling that predicted easy passage.

The tipping point was when former Gov. Ronald Reagan came out against it, along with then-Gov. Jerry Brown and then-President Carter.

Which brings me to Monday and Sister Roma at the Capitol.

I met Roma in a room full of queer leaders at a reception for Pride Month at the Capitol, where 16 LGBTQ+ activists were honored by the Senate and Assembly. Also in the room were the LGBTQ+ powerhouses of the Legislature, where more than 10% of elected officials now identify as something other than heterosexual.

It was a room you would not find in Kansas, Florida, Nebraska — or anywhere in 1978. Along with Sister Roma, resplendent in a royal blue feather headdress, those honored included tennis legends Billie Jean King and Rosemary Casals; Phil Collum, the first out assistant chief of police in Chula Vista; Janessa Goldbeck, a former Marine captain running for office in San Diego; and others you perhaps have never heard of, but who are engaged in lives of service to help make this state a better place.

The Sisters of Perpetual Indulgence have given more than $887,000 to charities since 2000, including the St. Cyprian's Episcopal Church "Fund an Immigrant" Program, AIDS Housing Alliance / SF and the Bay Area Rainbow Symphony. That's a bit more than the $1,500 they raised at their first fundraiser in 1980 for gay Cuban refugees. The Sisters have come a long way, but never strayed from their mission: to promulgate universal joy and expiate stigmatic guilt.

"I've never come from a place of hate," said Sister Roma, whose blue eyes are kind and unflinching.

"It actually hurts" that people believe she's ridiculing anything, she told me. But "visibility without fear encourages others," and so she and her sisters will continue to do what they do.

Each of the honorees walked down the center aisles of the Senate and Assembly to receive gilt-framed resolutions honoring their work. Republicans walked out of the chamber both times Sister Roma received her commendation. And a few hundred protesters gathered outside, allegedly upset by the "mockery" that Sister Roma and her order represent to the Catholic Church, which, let's remember, is facing bankruptcies across California as the financial toll of sexual abuse lawsuits mounts.

> 'Save the children' is just a recycled attack to serve a far-right intent on undermining democracy and maintaining the shaky status quo of power.

But as Senate President Pro Tem Toni Atkins (D-San Diego), the first gay woman to hold her post, told me at the reception, there has been a "sea change" in who holds power in California and there will be no going back to 1978.

"This comes down to freedom," Atkins said. Not just protecting it, but advancing it.

Earlier in the day, on the same steps where the protest against Sister Roma took place, LGBTQ+ legislators announced they are pursuing a state constitutional amendment for the 2024 ballot that would repeal Proposition 8, the 2008 initiative that banned same-sex marriage in California. Yes, it is still in California's Constitution despite being overturned by courts. It reads: "Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California."

If the U.S. Supreme Court does overturn the federal right to same-sex marriage, having that nullified proposition on the books could be a problem in California. So, as state Sen. Scott Wiener (D-San Francisco), one of the authors of the amendment, put it, "We need to be on the offensive."

Which brings to mind another quote from Milk.

"Like every other group, we must be judged by our leaders," he said, "and by those who are themselves gay, those who are visible."

With activists such as Sister Roma and elected officials such as Atkins and Wiener in office across the state, we are on the offensive. For all the hate that is out there, churned from the basest of motives and used to exploit parents, this is not Florida and it is not 1978.

In California, visibility and equality may not be perfect. But unlike leg warmers, closets are never coming back.

State targets cash apps that trap users in debt

[Cash apps, from B1]

These apps — EarnIn, DailyPay and Brigit — are examples of a fast-growing product called earned wage access, which the U.S. Treasury Department said advanced $9.5 billion to consumers through 56 million transactions in 2020 and continues to grow.

Similar to a high-cost payday loan, these apps offer workers emergency cash before paychecks. Like payday loans, they are disproportionately used by women, especially women of color and single mothers.

Unlike traditional payday loans, which are most frequently taken out by poor people, earned wage access "users are college-educated, middle-class, full-time workers," according to a report by FTI Consulting, which surveyed three companies' customers.

The typical recipient makes $50,700 a year and is "living paycheck-to-paycheck," the firm found. Nearly two-thirds of users were women, and half were people of color.

The companies operate in a legal gray area that allows them to function much like a payday lender but without the consumer-protection rules that govern those businesses.

The federal government also does not regulate them like banks, and their products are largely free from scrutiny under the Truth in Lending Act, thanks to a legal opinion issued by the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau during Donald Trump's presidency. Consumer advocates say that, though the companies' claims of "no mandatory fees" and "no interest" may be technically accurate, their true sticker price is high and abuses are rife.

In California, where many of these companies are based, regulators have begun to probe their practices. In March, the state's consumer protection agency, the Department of Financial Protection and Innovation, released a report that found earned wage access apps charged the equivalent of an annual average interest rate of between 331% and 334%.

The agency reached its conclusion after analyzing data from more than 5 million transactions from seven companies operating in the state. Rather than serving as an occasional stopgap, the department found workers used them habitually: an average of nine times per quarter, or 36 times a year. The agency has proposed rules that would make California the first state in the nation to regulate the product.

"It's a trap," said Melissa Burrola, 46, a single mother of three adult children who makes $19.50 an hour at a nonprofit that provides free food and clothing to poor residents in St. Paul, Minn. "I just want to get out of it."

Burrola turned to three earned wage apps when her car broke down in September, cobbling together $500 for repairs so she could get to work. Each app charged her a fee.

One of them, Dave, a Los Angeles-based "neobank" backed by billionaire entrepreneur Mark Cuban, also encouraged her to tip the company on top of a $6.99 fee she paid to get cash instantly. The default tip was set to $6 on a $100 advance.

"People are struggling," said Andrew Kushner, senior policy counsel for the Center for Responsible Lending, an advocacy group. "If you get money this week, that's less money to pay your expenses next week, and you're even worse off because of the fee."

California's proposed rules, published in March, would regulate app-based advances as loans and cap the interest rates and fees they could charge at the same levels as other financial products.

"We want to be sure we are doing everything we can to make sure people are being treated fairly," said Suzanne Martindale, who heads the agency's consumer financial protection division.

The industry strongly opposes California's proposed rules. EarnIn, which is based in Palo Alto, mounted a social media campaign to encourage its users to email state regulators, lawmakers and Gov. Gavin Newsom before a May 17 deadline for public comment.

A message EarnIn suggested its customers send to California officials says the app "allows me to manage my finances and helps me avoid having to choose which bills to pay, just because my paycheck hasn't landed in my account yet. ... Having access to my money in real-time also saves me from overdrafting and even allows me to proactively put away some money for a rainy day."

A spokesperson for the consumer agency said it had received thousands of comments on its proposal to regulate cash apps — a torrent compared with the hundreds it typically gets.

At the heart of the debate is the way earned wage access companies generate revenue. Rather than charging interest for money owed, many offer a free version of the app that features financial planning tools but provides cash advances only to customers who pay for a subscription.

Brigit, the app backed by Kutcher and Durant, charges $9.99 a month for a "plus plan" for people who "need cash ASAP." Representatives of Brigit did not respond to multiple inquiries.

Others, including EarnIn and Dave, offer free advances for customers who are willing to wait up to three days for a bank transfer but charge a fee to those who want cash immediately.

The apps also ask users to pay "tips," as they would for an Uber driver. Unlike Uber tips, however, those on paycheck advance apps don't go to a worker. They bolster the company's bottom line, state regulators note.

California regulators say those tips may not be entirely voluntary. In detailed reasoning published as part of its proposed rules, the state's financial protection agency said it found many examples of apps setting default tips and "using other user interface elements to make tipping hard to avoid."

Companies also made it difficult to set a $0 tip or did not advertise that a particular payment is optional.

JIM COOKE Los Angeles Times

CASH APPS operate in a legal gray area that allows them to function much like a payday lender but without the consumer-protection rules that govern such firms.

There were also examples of apps "disabling a service if a borrower does not tip ... [and] ... claiming that tips are used to help other vulnerable consumers or for charitable contributions."

"Their whole business model is predicated on this attempt to find a technical loophole in the definition of a loan under California law," said Kushner of the Center for Responsible Lending.

"It's dishonest and deceptive," said Gladys Washington, a 63-year-old in-home caretaker from Philadelphia who gets cash advances from EarnIn multiple times a month.

Washington scoffed when told the company was arguing its products could not legally be described as a loan. "If you have to borrow something and have to pay it back, that's a loan," she said. "I don't see how that could be any different."

Washington said she's found it difficult, but not impossible, to avoid paying for tips on the EarnIn platform: "You have to hit 'minus' over and over again," she said.

Washington said she regularly pays the company's "Lightning Speed" fee — usually $3.99 per transaction — to get cash immediately rather than wait to get the advance free of charge.

"If you need the money now and you have to wait two days otherwise, that's not free," she said, rejecting EarnIn's claim that it charges "no mandatory fees."

Burrola said she felt pressured to tip. "We really could use a tip for the last time," read one message from a cash app called MoneyLion. It included a photo of a young white woman holding her hands on her heart.

One time, when she chose not to tip, a picture of a bespectacled Black man appeared on the app. "Looks like we didn't get a tip last time!" says the text beneath the photo. "We recommend [a] $6 tip." A MoneyLion spokesperson said the company declined to comment.

Another time, Burrola said, the app Dave told her a tip would help a charity called Feeding America with which Dave has partnered. The frequent fees and the tips cut into Burrola's upcoming paychecks, leading her to take more advances, incur more fees and fall behind.

"It just kept going," she said. Eight months later, fees from the apps have compounded her financial troubles and she remains on a hamster wheel of cash advances and charges.

A spokesperson for Dave declined to comment for this report, but noted the company offers fee-free advances to customers willing to wait for the money or have it deposited on a company debit card. The company said tips are entirely voluntary and that any customer who wants a refund need only contact customer service.

Burrola said she was unaware that tips could be refunded. "They sure do not tell you this," she said.

Women have been more likely than men to use these services in part because they are less likely to have access to bank products, such as home equity loans and credit cards, according to a 2021 research report from Arizent, the publisher of American Banker.

Under the proposed California regulations, tips would be treated as charges under the law, count against maximum fees allowed and be subject to strict limits.

Even as California looks to impose restrictions, industry-backed legislation has been introduced this year in Missouri, Mississippi, South Carolina and Vermont, using model language from the conservative American Legislative Exchange Council. The model legislation says a company could be said to not charge mandatory fees and accept tips "as long as the Provider offers the Consumer at least one option of receiving Proceeds at no cost."

California regulators say they are reviewing the mountain of comments they received on the draft rules and hope to finalize regulations by the end of the year. Regardless of which approach they take, the rising cost of living will continue to drive the most financially vulnerable consumers to the apps — a trend some of the companies are banking on.

In a presentation Dave shared with investors for an earnings call in May, company executives described their target market as 37 million Americans who are "financially vulnerable" because their spending outstrips their income, they have minimal savings and they frequently overdraft their bank accounts.

Another 139 million Americans, the presentation showed, are "financially coping" because they have overdrafts "several times a year" and have "insufficient long term savings." Both these groups are growing in number, the company reported, providing a "large addressable market exhibiting solid growth trajectory."

L.A. apologizes for attacks

back heckled him, calling him a racist. Others urged them to show respect. Since De León's participation in a secretly recorded racist conversation with other city leaders was made public last year, his presence in the council has often brought jeers from protesters.

In the first week of June 1943, minority youths were beaten and harassed and their clothing was ripped off in the streets, according to reports from the time.

"I remember my mother distinctly telling me when I was a kid how angry and upset she was watching young Mexican kids running down the street naked from having their suit ripped off," said Miguel Lopez with the Chicano Moratorium Committee, who was flanked in the front of the council chamber by a few dozen people dressed in pachuco style.

As the speakers stood at the front of council chambers, historical images, old newspaper clippings and recent footage of lowriders cruising over the 6th Street Viaduct flashed on TV screens. The newspaper clippings highlighted the support that outlets at the time, namely The Times, gave to the cause of the white mobs rather than the victims. "Zoot suiters learn lesson in fights with servicemen," read one headline.

Manny Alcaraz, described as a pachuco culture enthusiast, said he hoped the city's apology would inform young generations both about the riots and the long list of famous Zoot Suiters who wore the attire: Cesar Chavez, Cab Calloway and Malcolm X, to name a few. "This week, tonight, the Zoot Suit riots were ongoing," he said. "This is what I want the younger generation to know."

Racial tensions at the time had been heightened by the now notorious Sleepy Lagoon murder trial. After a young Latino man was killed in Southeast L.A., 300 suspects were rounded up, most of them Latino. Twenty-two boys were charged, fueling anti-Mexican sentiment.

Through the resolution, the city formally apologized for wielding its power to outlaw the wide-legged trousers and billowy coats rather than cracking down on the white mobs perpetrating the violence.

"The Los Angeles City Council and the City of Los Angeles must apologize for responding to these racialized attacks by attempting to pass an ordinance to ban wearing Zoot Suits rather than seeking to protect the community who was directly targeted by this brutal multi-day assault," the resolution said.

The celebration comes on the heels of a similar apology by L.A. County. Last month, the county voted unanimously to condemn the attacks and vowed to fight racial discrimination.

Michael F. Sfregola

February 27, 1954 - May 23, 2023

An attorney who likened his work on contracts/agreements to that of a master carpenter creating a seamless desk with hidden compartments, Michael Sfregola created works of art for his long- term business clients. It is likely some of his clients didn't know about the secret compartments, but it gave Mike satisfaction knowing they were there, even if never utilized. With patience and attention to detail, Mike developed his craft, not to garner accolades, but to meet his own high standards.

Michael F. Sfregola was a partner at the Los Angeles office of the law firm Gibson, Dunn, & Crutcher from 2005 until his semi-retirement in 2018. Before moving to Gibson, he was a long- time partner at the Orange County office of Allen Matkins. His expertise was in real estate and tax, and he worked with both private and institutional real estate investors. He had special expertise with the acquisition and financing of hotel, resort, commercial, and residential projects, in the United States, Asia, and Europe. He was enlisted to work with "family-owned" real estate companies in guiding succession, governance, and planning decisions. He was consistently ranked as one of the top real estate and tax lawyers in the country, highly ranked in Chambers USA and Who's Who Legal. In 2018, Mike was honored by the L.A. County Bar Real Property Section with its annual award for Outstanding Real Estate Lawyer.

Mike was so well-liked by his colleagues at Gibson he was affectionately given the moniker "mensch of all mensches". A great listener who valued the opinions of others, he was respectful of others' viewpoints. He enjoyed mentoring upcoming lawyers, especially mindful of creating opportunities for female associates to shine. Mike possessed a dry wit and folksy humor that disarmed opposing counsel. In fact, Mike was often sought after to join opposing counsel after the closing of a deal. A successful deal was one in which, after closing, all parties believed they got something they wanted.

As is the custom at Gibson, Mike contributed many hours of pro bono work, on land use, charter school, and immigration issues. Mike had a keen interest in the complexities of the issues contributing to people becoming unhoused and had hopes of working on solutions in his retirement.

Mike graduated summa cum laude from the University of California, Irvine in 1976. He graduated from USC Gould School of Law in 1979, where he was elected to the Order of the Coif.

Raised Orange County in a family of five children full of laughter and typical suburban mischief, Mike went on to raise five children of his own in Long Beach with his wife Coni. Their children: Emilie, Dominick, Michael, James, and Claire enjoyed dad being the occasional little league coach and all-time master of the pinata party. There never was a late night school art project that couldn't benefit from dad's embellishment. Saturday morning donuts were procured by dad every weekend, come rain or shine. Mike was incredibly proud of his children. He and Coni raised them to be independent, intelligent, honorable people, and none of them fell short in these regards.

Mike enjoyed four years of semi-retirement during which he traveled to Spain, Vietnam, Cambodia, taking cycling trips and visiting art museums, with his second wife Sue, who will unendingly cherish their fully-lived thirteen years together.

In addition to his children, Sue, and Coni, Mike is survived by three amazing daughter-in-laws: Carly, Alexis, and Eva; the light of his life, his beautiful, talented granddaughter Louise; wonderful, supportive sisters Celeste Elliot, Kathy Adams, and Patrice Moody (predeceased); his younger brother John; adored nieces, nephews, and grandnieces and nephews.

This self-effacing, funny, kind, brilliant, and hard-working attorney/father/husband is irreplaceable. His imprint as an attorney, husband, but most importantly, father, will be felt far into the future. Just like the seamless, artful "desks" he made for his clients, he was one-of-a-kind.

Donations in Mike's honor will be gratefully accepted by Bet Tzedek and/or El Nido Family Centers.

Solutions to Friday's puzzles

Complete the grid so each row, column and 3-by-3 or 2-by-3 box contains every digit from 1 to 9 (or 1 to 6 for the smaller grid). For strategies on how to solve Sudoku, visit www.sudoku.org.uk.

KENKEN

Every box will contain a number; numbers depend on the size of the grid. For a 6x6 puzzle, use Nos. 1-6. Do not repeat a number in any row or column. The numbers in each heavily outlined set of squares must combine to produce the target number found in the top left corner of the cage using the mathematical operation indicated. A number can be repeated within a cage as long as it is not in the same row or column.

HOROSCOPE

By Holiday Mathis

Aries (March 21-April 19): Before the art arrives, a museum is just white walls and spotlights. You are similarly endowed now in your capacity to become a blank slate on which the art can happen.

Taurus (April 20-May 20): When you get quiet and breathe, you'll hear your inner voice loud and clear.

Gemini (May 21-June 21): Because of your thriving imagination, you are thrilled by the potential in relationships and also disappointed when they don't meet your expectations.

Cancer (June 22-July 22): The trick to keeping the good energy bobbing along is to let go of the heaviness. This is a day for lightness.

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22): Your mannerisms are your signature. Some you got from people around you and others are your own invention. All are charming to someone who witnesses you today.

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Someone will imitate you this week, and you will feel how this really is the purest form of flattery.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 23): Your appetites and your curiosity are the most direct lines to your success. Listen to them today.

Scorpio (Oct. 24-Nov. 21): While the whole of reality is known to none, the clearest picture is known by those who recognize the limits of their perception and question everything.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): One way to get ready for the social opportunities coming your way is to have a number of fun topics in your conversational bag.

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A busy life feels reassuring on some levels, but it's the moments of peace that are most important to your general well-being.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Seek inspiration, and anything that doesn't inspire you today, press delete.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20): Allow yourself to be guided by your intuition as you explore the avenues for personal and professional growth that will open to you today.

Today's birthday (June 10): You'll be needed and called on, and you'll come out of it the hero you are, hands on your hips, cape flapping. Don't worry, you'll also be lavished in love and treated to the excitements of those who recognize what you do in the world is truly remarkable. More fun: shenanigans with friends, a technical advance that makes your life easier and new family. Libra and Capricorn adore you. Your lucky numbers: 3, 10, 13, 15 and 26.

BRIDGE

By Frank Stewart

"Simple Saturday" columns focus on basic technique and logical thinking.

You're declarer at today's 3NT. West leads a spade, East plays the 10 and your queen wins. You count six top tricks: two spades, two hearts, a club and a diamond. You can win three more — nine in all — if a minor-suit finesse wins.

Which finesse should you try first? One is just as likely to work as the other.

The lead is in your hand, so say you finesse in diamonds as a matter of convenience. East takes the king and returns a spade. You take your ace, go to dummy and let the jack of clubs ride. But West wins and runs his spades.

Since West's spades are a threat, you should force out his possible entry early, before the spades are set up. Lead a heart to dummy at Trick Two and return the jack of clubs. If West wins and leads another spade, you win and finesse in diamonds. That finesse loses, but as you hope, East has no more spades. You will get back in to take your tricks.

You hold: ♠ 10 5 ♥ Q J 9 6 ♦ K 6 4 ♣ 5 4 3 2. Your partner opens one heart, the next player doubles and you raise to two hearts. Left-hand opponent bids three clubs, and two passes follow. What do you say?

Answer: You have only six high-card points, but to bid three hearts is clear. Possession of a good nine-card trump fit suggests that you compete to the three level. Moreover, your partner's hand is marked short in clubs, so the play should go well.

ASK AMY

Take a minute to say hello

Dear Readers: A recent query from "Perplexed in Suburbia" asked why people under the age of 50 don't return friendly "hellos."

I posited that this might be a regional issue, but also asked readers if my generation has raised a generation of "rude-niks."

The responses flowed in, and I am sharing a representative sample.

I think it's vital to understand that we never really know what others are going through, which is a great reason to be friendly, regardless of the reaction.

Dear Amy: At our family's rural retreat strangers wave vigorously from their cars and trucks when encountered on the roads.

In our closely spaced prosperous cul de sac in the D.C. suburbs, every encounter is a chilly nonevent.

People in urban neighborhoods don't want to risk taking on new relationships carelessly ... they ain't got the time! But out in ruralville, loneliness is the threat.

DAVE IN BETHESDA, MD.

Dear Dave: I hear you.

Dear Amy: I live in a city high-rise, and I have noticed that most young people getting on the elevator behave as though there's no one else in there! But I don't think it's the way they were raised.

I think many people earlier in life haven't realized that we are here only for a short time, and that even the most fortunate have sorrows, fears and disappointments, and that we can ease each other's way with acknowledgment and kindness.

It takes a bit of living to see that. Almost without exception, my older neighbors make eye contact, smile and say hello. I believe the younger ones will do so eventually.

ALIVE IN CHICAGO

Dear Alive: I agree with your take on this, and, like you, I remain optimistic.

Dear Amy: I make that same observation all the time about people under the age of 50 in my safe suburban neighborhood.

My theory: We raised our children to be so worried about stranger abductions that they reflexively avoid strangers to this day.

When you raise a generation of children to be paranoid, this is the result.

FRIENDLY

Dear Friendly: Many readers observed that this is a longer-term consequence of "stranger danger."

Dear Amy: I live in a very quiet neighborhood and chat regularly with a few neighbors. Otherwise, I'm an introvert. I have been accused of being a snob. I think introverts are just misunderstood.

I hope "Perplexed" continues to greet everyone. This person is making the world a better place. And I'll try harder myself, just for having read the letter.

INTROVERT

Dear Introvert: A beautiful response.

Dear Amy: The other day, my wife and I were walking on the sidewalk and met a group of three high school kids. We said hello (as we often do), and as often happens, for the most part they ignored us.

However, just after they passed us, we overheard one boy say to one girl, "Why did they talk to us?"

She responded, "They were being nice, dumbass."

Apparently, she gets it, but her friends don't.

ALSO FROM SUBURBIA

Dear Also: The cluelessness is very "on brand."

THE WEATHER

Today in Southern California

June gloom increases for the weekend: A developing upper-level area of low pressure will track to the east across the L.A. Basin this weekend, resulting in clouds and cool conditions. Drizzle will occur Saturday night into Sunday, and some roadways could become slick, especially Sunday morning. The upper low will shift east on Monday, and the weather will slowly improve through the middle of next week.

PHILLIES CATCHER J.T. Realmuto steals second ahead of Miguel Rojas' tag in the bottom of the eighth. Shelby Miller struck out the next two batters to strand Realmuto and keep the score tied heading to the ninth.

Dodgers' rotation in flux again

[Dodgers, from B12]

To combat the left-handed stars at the top of the Phillies' batting order, the Dodgers used left-handed reliever Victor González as an opener in front of rookie right-hander Michael Grove — one of the four healthy pitchers left in the Dodgers' rotation.

The plan worked early on, with González and Grove combining for a scoreless first inning to protect the team's early one-run lead.

The next two times Grove faced the Phillies' top bats, though, things went sideways quickly.

Kyle Schwarber tripled and scored in the third inning to tie the score.

Then, after Miguel Vargas misplayed a grounder to lead off the fifth, Grove was unable to escape the frame, yielding three more runs on a walk, RBI double, run-scoring wild pitch and RBI single.

"Just didn't throw the ball well at all today," Grove said, after giving up four runs and seven hits in four-plus innings. "Made a few pitches when I needed to, but stuff piled up and just wasn't executing."

The Dodgers' offense briefly bailed him out, tying the score at 4-4 on back-to-back home runs from Mookie Betts and Freddie Freeman in the top of the seventh.

Middle relievers Alex Vesia ($1\frac{1}{3}$ scoreless innings) and Shelby Miller (two scoreless innings) then got the game to the ninth inning, keeping a come-from-behind victory within the Dodgers' reach.

Alas, just one out from forcing extra innings, left-hander Caleb Ferguson instead was on the short end of a second walk-off loss this week.

In a 1-and-1 count against Schwarber, Ferguson threw a cutter that stayed over the heart of the plate. Schwarber pounced on it, sending a line-drive home run screaming into the right-field seats.

"Just one bad pitch to a really good hitter," Ferguson said. "Left it over the middle of the plate. That's what they do."

Ferguson's effort Friday wasn't nearly as ugly as the three-run, three-walk blown save he suffered Tuesday in Cincinnati.

"He's frustrated," said Roberts, who consoled the reliever with a quick chat postgame. "You never want to get walked off. But that potential comes with pitching late in games."

And though the Dodgers' late-game bullpen plan remains uncertain — especially on nights such as Friday, when top reliever Evan Phillips was going to be available only for a save situation after a heavy recent workload — their short-handed rotation could cause the biggest headaches for the next few weeks.

Without Urías, the Dodgers will have to pivot to a bullpen game Sunday. After that, they haven't decided how they will compensate for the left-hander's latest setback.

Their minor league pitching depth is thin, especially because Gavin Stone is considered a non-option at the moment, according to Roberts, after his recent big league struggles.

With four off days this month, Roberts said the Dodgers could try to proceed with a four-man rotation instead until Urías is ready — though that plan threatens to put further strain on their overworked relievers.

"Given the off days, I think we potentially could manage it," Roberts said. "I think where we stand, we'll be OK."

Maybe. But at this juncture, the Dodgers are in an unenviable position, trying to work around absences in their rotation and inconsistencies in their bullpen that have culminated in a sudden, deflating 1-4 stretch.

Angels hold on, win fifth in a row

pitch basis, he's also working in a more condensed way because of the pitch clock.

Ohtani said that could be affecting how tired he gets but overall he feels healthy.

"Like you said, I've been pitching more often compared to the last couple of years, last two years," Ohtani said, "and there are times where I feel a little more fatigued maybe because of that.

"But for the most part, I feel pretty good and healthy right now and the goal is to stay healthy to the end of the season."

Ohtani was given an extra day of rest, his usual turn through the rotation getting pushed back to Friday after a poor outing in Houston and because the Angels have had only six days off in 65 games. Ohtani said he did not feel the effects of the additional day off.

Ohtani walked his first batter, needing 31 pitches to get through the first inning. He also gave up a two-run home run to Jarred Kelenic, which prompted an early chat with pitching coach Matt Wise.

The second inning flowed much smoother, as Ohtani retired the side in order on a strikeout, groundout and popup. And he helped keep the Mariners from scoring again until the fifth inning, when Ty France singled home Jose Caballero.

Ohtani's command, however, appeared shaky through Friday's game, with at least three pitches going high and inside to three different batters. One of those pitches hit Julio Rodríguez in the shoulder in the fifth inning.

"I feel like it's the way I'm moving my body," Ohtani said. "I feel like I'm being less efficient with how I'm moving my body down the mound."

At the plate, he went three for four, falling just a triple short of a the cycle and hitting a 440-foot, two-run blast into the right-center-field seats.

Joyce leaves game

Joyce replaced Ohtani to start the top of the sixth inning, but his outing lasted only five pitches before he was pulled with what the team initially called right hand irritation.

Joyce said after the game that it was after one pitch in the middle of the five that he felt tingling and numbness in his hand and forearm.

Manager Phil Nevin said that it's usually not a good thing when a pitcher gets pulled the way Joyce did, but that the team was waiting for him to be further evaluated to determine the extent of his injury.

Focused Nuggets on cusp of first crown

DENVER forward Aaron Gordon passes between two Miami defenders in the second half of the Nuggets' Game 4 win. Gordon scored 27 points to lead Denver.

MIAMI — The mission for the Denver Nuggets was clear: Come to Miami, get two wins and head back home with a chance to finally become NBA champions.

It's officially there for the taking.

The 47-year wait for Denver might be over as soon as Monday, with Nikola Jokic and his Nuggets now just one win away from getting the title that he's wanted for so long. Aaron Gordon scored 27 points, Jokic added 23 and the Nuggets beat the Miami Heat 108-95 on Friday night to take a 3-1 lead in the NBA Finals.

"We haven't done a damn thing yet," Nuggets coach Michael Malone said. "We have to win another game to be world champions."

Bruce Brown scored 21 off the bench for the Nuggets, who won their fifth straight road game to grab command. They'll have three chances to win one game for a title, two of those in Denver, the first in what's sure to be a raucous atmosphere for Game 5.

Jamal Murray had 15 points and 12 assists — his fourth consecutive double-digit assist game — for Denver.

"Today was a team effort." Murray said. "I can't even name one person. Everybody locked in. We've got one more to go."

Jimmy Butler scored 25 points for Miami, which has now fallen into 3-1 holes in each of its last three finals appearances — this one joining 2014 and 2020. Bam Adebayo had 20 points and 11 rebounds for the Heat, while Kyle Lowry added 13 points.

The Heat walked off the floor in silence, fully aware of how much trouble they're in now.

"Now we're in a must-win situation, every single game — which we're capable of," Butler said. "It's not impossible."

The Nuggets were overwhelming favorites to start the series, for obvious reasons. Denver was the Western Conference's No. 1 seed; Miami was the Eastern Conference's No. 8 seed.

The Nuggets had won nine of the last 10 regular-season meetings between the teams, and their run of success over the Heat has continued through four games of the finals.

"Our guys are locked in, man," Malone said. "We're focused."

Denver led by 13 going into the fourth, and Miami came out for the final quarter with appropriate desperation. The Heat scored the first eight points, Jokic committed his fifth foul and had to go to the bench with 9:24 left — and it was down to 86-81 when Butler converted a three-point play with 8:42 remaining.

But the Nuggets — who fell apart in the fourth quarter of Game 2 for their lone loss of the series — didn't fold, even with their two-time MVP still out. Murray made a three-pointer to stop Miami's 8-0 spurt, and Jeff Green made a huge corner 3 from near the Heat bench for a 94-85 edge with 6:21 left.

"We have guys that can step up, night in and night out," Gordon said.

Jokic checked out with Denver up 10. He came back with the Nuggets up nine. Miami didn't take advantage of that chance, and now finds itself on the wrong end of history.

A team that had to scramble just to make the playoffs now needs to pull off the ultimate scramble to win a championship.

"This is what this year's been all about for this group, so definitely not going to hang our heads or quit," Heat guard Duncan Robinson said. "That's not an option. It's not going to happen. So we'll band together and get on this flight tomorrow and find a way to figure it out."

Teams that take a 3-1 lead in the NBA Finals have won 35 out of 36 previous times.

Quick's leadership helps carry Vegas

[Elliott, from B12]
Quick is glad to be a resource for Hill but isn't trying to change Hill's game. "He's playing some pretty good hockey in his own right, so you try to help him out when the opportunity arises but you don't want to kind of overstep and say too much," Quick said before the Final began. "He's playing the way he is because of the work he put in throughout his career."

Hill, who was traded by San Jose to Las Vegas last summer for a fourth-round draft pick, got the starting job after Laurent Brossoit suffered a lower-body injury in the second round. He has kept it because of his sustained excellence, compiling a 2.12 goals-against average and postseason-best .934 save percentage in 14 games. Even after being beaten Thursday by the wicked wrister from Carter Verhaeghe 4 minutes and 27 seconds into overtime that gave Florida a 3-2 victory, Hill had stopped 82 of 89 shots in the Final.

Although Quick isn't making highlight-reel appearances, he's still making a difference for the Golden Knights.

"To me, he's been outstanding every time I've talked to him. In practice, if he's not the hardest working guy, he's close to it," Vegas coach Bruce Cassidy said during interviews at the team's beachside hotel.

"He wants to stay on top of his game in case he does get an opportunity to get in the net. That part's been terrific, just his work ethic, leading by example."

That's not all. "I hear him in the locker room, doing his part, relaying experiences, supporting the team," Cassidy said. "So that's the challenge in front of a backup: You've got to be a bit of a cheerleader in that regard and support, sort of a sounding board for the guy who's playing every night. He's done all those things.

"I can't say enough good things about him. I'll go back to the season when he helped us win games to get us in the position we're in, which is win the Pacific Division. He helped us a lot. So, nothing but good from Jonathan, and I don't see that changing."

The Kings felt they couldn't win with Quick in goal andacquired Joonas Korpisalo from Columbus. They were dismissed in the first round, and Korpisalo is an unrestricted free agent whose signing price will be difficult for the Kings to squeeze under the salary-cap limit. It was the right decision, but for Quick — also about to become an unrestricted free agent — it must feel like karma that after a shockingly abrupt separation from the only organization he'd ever known, he's now two wins from winning the Cup again.

He keeps in touch with his old teammates, he said, but he politely declined to discuss the trade when asked about it before the Final. He wanted to keep the focus on his new team, which is reasonable.

"Being back and playing hockey in June, it's exciting," he said. "Everybody in the league, they want to be playing hockey this time of year. We're fortunate enough, us and Florida, so you just try and make the most of it.

"At this point of the year, whatever your role is, you do it and you do it to the best of your ability to help your teammates win."

He has done that twice before. Now, he's doing it again, in a less visible but still vital way.

Baffert is back at the Belmont

[Belmont, from B12]
Treasure, wins the Belmont Stakes on Saturday, it will be a streak of 16 races with different winners starting with Justify.

"No one is going for a Triple Crown this year," Baffert said. "The Triple Crown makes all the difference. It's history being made and it's difficult. You learn to appreciate it."

This year's Belmont is probably the best of the Triple Crown races. The Kentucky Derby was overshadowed by a spike in horse fatalities and scratches. The Preakness Stakes did not have an impressive array of horses. Most of the Belmont attention is focused on Forte, who was the Derby favorite before Kentucky state officials scratched the colt on race day because of a bruised hoof. He is the morning line favorite for the Belmont at 5-2 odds. Tapit Trice, who finished seventh in the Derby, is the second pick at 3-1 while Angel of Empire, who was third in the Derby, is at 7-2.

Baffert's top assistant, Jimmy Barnes, has been supervising the training of Preakness winner National Treasure as Baffert didn't arrive in New York until Thursday night after a six-hour flight delay.

His late arrival also helps partially explain why he has been absent from Belmont Park for so long.

"Usually, we would be at Churchill Downs," Baffert said. "When we come from Churchill, we come in on a Wednesday. But being that I wasn't at Churchill, but was coming from California, I came in later. If I was at Churchill, I would be here earlier."

The reason Baffert was not at Churchill is a two-year ban imposed by the track after Medina Spirit tested positive for a medication banned on race day after he won the Kentucky Derby in 2021. After it was clear that Medina Spirit was not going to run in the Belmont, the New York Racing Assn. banned Baffert for two years, later reduced to one, even though he never had a horse fail a drug test in the state.

"We're still dealing with that right now," Baffert said of the ongoing litigation. "We're still in the process of wondering why they did that. … I just want to clear my name."

Last year during the Triple Crown series, Baffert was serving a 90-day suspension from Kentucky, and honored by all states, for the Medina Spirit violation.

Baffert's Churchill ban is set to expire July 3. For the last two years, Baffert's Derby horses were transferred to Tim Yakteen, his former assistant. National Treasure was moved to Yakteen this year to run in the Santa Anita Derby, but his fourth-place finish wasn't good enough to get him into the Derby field. After the race, the colt was transferred back to Baffert.

"Just getting to the Derby is tough," Baffert said. "Then, if a horse doesn't run well in the Derby, they say he's just tired. And the people are tired too. It's still going to be an exciting race, the Belmont is very important to the fans in New York. It's tradition.

"All the good horses used to run in all the big races. Now the trainer wants to pick their spots, give their horse a month off. … Look, there are only nine horses [in Saturday's race]. We've had three weeks and there are still only nine horses. … It's the classics and the Breeders' Cup that keeps this sport going."

As the 2023 Triple Crown series comes to a close Saturday, the sport hopes to come out of the shadow of controversies and point itself to the Breeders' Cup at Santa Anita in November.

Hernández injury could end career

[Galaxy, from B12]
"It's a long period of time," he said of the rehab. "I know with his work rate and with his passion and desire to be out there, he's going to do the work and put himself in position to come back."

Hernández, who played 74 games for the Galaxy over four years, led the team in scoring in each of the last two full seasons and his 35 goals combined were second-best in MLS over that span. He missed the first five games this season with a hamstring injury and has just a goal and an assist in nine appearances for the Galaxy (3-9-3).

Mexico's all-time leading scorer with 52 international goals, Hernández came to the Galaxy ahead of the 2020 season, signing a three-year contract that paid him more than $19.4 million. With the transfer fee the team had to pay Spanish club Sevilla for the rights to sign Hernández, the deal cost the Galaxy $28.8 million.

Performance clauses in the designated-player contract were triggered last year, extending the deal for a fourth season and a guaranteed $7.4 million, making Hernández the third-highest-paid player in the league. If the Galaxy place Hernández on the season-ending injury list, they can sign another designated player, but because of sanctions levied against the team by MLS last December over violations of the league's salary rules, the Galaxy are limited as to the type of player they can sign to replace him.

Hernández made his first-team debut in 2006 for Mexico. After the 2010 World Cup, in which he scored twice, Hernández jumped to Manchester United of the English Premier League, the first stop on a five-team, three-country European tour that would also see him play for Real Madrid, Bayern Leverkusen, West Ham United and Sevilla, winning two EPL championships, Europe League and Club World Cup titles and start in a Champions League final.

Djokovic puts hurt on Alcaraz

Veteran icon outlasts cramping 20-year-old for berth in French Open final vs. Ruud.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JEAN-FRANCOIS BADIAS Associated Press

A RECORD-BREAKING 23rd Grand Slam championship is within reach for Novak Djokovic, above, who won despite a highlight-reel shot by Carlos Alcaraz.

PARIS — Novak Djokovic used every bit of his experience, relentlessness and fitness to beat a cramping Carlos Alcaraz 6-3, 5-7, 6-1, 6-1 at the French Open on Friday and move one win away from a record 23rd Grand Slam title.

The No. 1-ranked Alcaraz produced one particularly brilliant shot — one that went viral within minutes and could be talked about for years — en route to claiming the second set of what, at the time, was a closely contested and thrilling showdown.

But in the end, this highly anticipated matchup was as anticlimactic as can be.

That's because early in the third set, after nearly 2½ hours of exertion and tension in 85-degree heat at Court Philippe Chatrier, Alcaraz's body began to lock up. First, his hand began to cramp. Then his legs. And so, at 1-1, Alcaraz needed to take a break and get treated by a trainer. Because it was not a changeover, Alcaraz was required to forfeit the following game and fell behind 2-1.

Djokovic, 36, cruised from there and moved closer to a 23rd Grand Slam championship, which would break a tie with rival Rafael Nadal for the men's record.

"I can understand the emotions and circumstances that affect you mentally and emotionally. ... Maybe for the first time in his career, he was expected to win," Djokovic said. "It's a part of the learning curve."

Score one for the old guys.

"I've never felt the tension that I did in that match," said the 20-year-old Alcaraz, who said the stress he sensed because of the stakes, and the daunting foe across the net, caused cramps in "every part of my body."

"He has been in that situation multiple times," Alcaraz said. "More than me."

On Sunday, Djokovic will meet No. 4 Casper Ruud, who eliminated No. 22 Alexander Zverev 6-3, 6-4, 6-0.

Ruud will be playing in his third final at the last five majors — including in Paris a year ago, when he lost to Nadal — but is still seeking his first such trophy.

"I tried to play without too many feelings," Ruud said, "without too much pressure."

Djokovic's match against Alcaraz represented the widest age gap in a men's Grand Slam semifinal since 1991. They sure put on a show for two exhilarating, exhausting sets, with fans breaking into chants of both men's nicknames: "No-le!" and "Car-li-tos!"

"We went toe-to-toe," Djokovic said.

He was at his stretching, sliding best, whipping groundstrokes that pushed Alcaraz all over the place. Alcaraz, somehow, chased just about everything down, his speed and instinct as good as there is.

Nothing was as memorable as the second-set highlight shot by Alcaraz, reminiscent of one conjured up by Roger Federer on the same court years ago.

Having lured Alcaraz forward, Djokovic sent the ball toward the baseline. Alcaraz gave chase, running with his back to the net, then sliding beyond the baseline, his left foot bending as he came to a halt and spun his body around, leaning backward in order to lace a forehand past Djokovic for a winner.

As the crowd roared and rose for an ovation to celebrate the feat, Alcaraz raised his left hand and briefly jutted his index finger into the "No. 1" gesture.

He smiled a wide smile.

Even Djokovic had to smile, and used his racket to applaud.

Yuan leads Canadian Open

WIRE REPORTS

Carl Yuan moved into position to turn around a forgettable rookie year on the PGA Tour, shooting a five-under-par 67 in cool, rainy conditions Friday to take a one-shot lead at the midway point of the RBC Canadian Open in Toronto.

Two-time defending champion Rory McIlroy gave himself a chance heading into the weekend at Oakdale. He shot 67 and was three shots back of Yuan's two-day total of nine-under 135.

Corey Conners, seeking to become the first Canadian to win his national open since 1954, shot 69 and was one shot back. Joining him were Tyrrell Hatton — who shot 64 to set the course record for Oakdale's composite routing — C.T. Pan (66) and Aaron Rai (69).

"Really happy with the start," Conners said. "Fun playing in front of the Canadian fans. Just enjoying the walk out there."

Conners is coming off a tie for 12th in the PGA Championship at Oak Hill.

"I would say this week I've been a lot more relaxed than even I was there and I felt like I was quite relaxed at the PGA Championship," he said. "So I'm feeling good about my game and able to play with freedom and confidence. I'm just having a lot of fun."

Yuan, a 26-year-old from China who played college golf at Washington, has made seven of 20 cuts this season, with his best finish a tie for 21st at the Sony Open in Hawaii in January.

Holmqvist in front at LPGA event

Dani Holmqvist shot a career-best seven-under 64 to take a one-shot lead over Jenny Shin and Chinese rookie Yan Liu after the first round of the ShopRite LPGA Classic at Galloway, N.J.

Two-time ShopRite winner Anna Nordqvist and Georgia Hall were in a group of five two shots off the lead in the 54-hole event on the Bay Course at Seaview.

Shin, from South Korea, had six birdies in a bogey-free round in search of her first win since 2016. It is her only win on tour, but she has been a steady earner, pocketing $5.4 million since turning pro in 2010.

Liu had a wild round that featured eagles on Nos. 9 and 18. She also had two birdies and three bogeys in her first five holes. She was one over heading to No. 9 and played the last 10 in seven under. Her tie for 21st last week at Mizuho was her best finish of the year.

Leonard's hot start

Justin Leonard birdied four of his last five holes and shot a course-record 10-under 62 to take the first-round lead at the American Family Insurance Championship in Madison, Wis.

It was Leonard's lowest score in relation to par in any event he has played on any tour.

Steve Stricker, Marco Dawson and Steven Alker were three shots back of Leonard after 65s in the Champions Tour event.

For Stricker, it was his 53rd consecutive round of par or better, which is a record for any player at any PGA Tour sanctioned event.

Defending champion Thongchai Jaidee shot a two-over 74.

Different role, but Quick a rock for Knights

HELENE ELLIOTT

SUNRISE, Fla. — The Vegas Golden Knights weren't expecting they'd get in-his-prime Jonathan Quick when they acquired the 37-year-old goaltender from Columbus, a day after the Kings had traded the backbone of their 2012 and 2014 Stanley Cup championship teams to the Blue Jackets.

Quick's numbers with the Kings weren't pretty: 11-13-4 with a 3.50 goals-against average and .876 save percentage in 31 games. But the Golden Knights, perilously thin in net because of injuries, saw value in his experience, his pedigree and the fact he was a warm body who could shore up the lone vulnerable spot on a potential championship roster.

They got what they needed — and more. Although Quick hasn't played in the playoffs, he helped Vegas finish first in the Pacific Division and put it in position to launch its run to the Stanley Cup Final, which it leads two games to one heading into Game 4 on Saturday at FLA Live Arena.

"He's been awesome. He's an unbelievable teammate. He's one of those ultimate competitors. He's been great for our goalies, I think," Vegas defenseman Brayden McNabb, who was Quick's teammate for three seasons with the Kings, said Friday.

"He's a guy who's won and been there. He says the stuff at the right times. It all makes sense. He's been unbelievable for our team and for our room. When he's gone in, he's played well. That was a huge pickup."

Quick has accepted being the backup to Adin Hill, playing his new role with his old fire. Hill welcomed Quick's support, calling him "a good guy to relate to and talk to. He's been a great addition to our team." Hill also appears to have absorbed some of Quick's feistiness, as evidenced when Hill slashed a crease-crashing Matthew Tkachuk and put out the not-welcome mat by thrusting his blocker at the heads of Tkachuk and Nick Cousins earlier in the Final. Vintage Quick moves, indeed.

Trouble from start to finish

Dodgers delay Urías' return, then suffer third walk-off loss this week

PHILADELPHIA 5
DODGERS 4

By Jack Harris

PHILADELPHIA — The Dodgers have been running short on pitching options lately.

Both to start games — and finish them.

In less than a week, the team went from having a potential surplus of starting pitching to being shorthanded in the rotation once again after a setback to Julio Urías' hamstring injury.

In that same time, they've watched their once-improving bullpen slip back into a late-game slump, suffering their third walk-off loss of this week's trip in a 5-4 defeat Friday to the Philadelphia Phillies.

"A loss is a loss, but when you feel like you're in it and you get walked off, that never feels good," Dodgers manager Dave Roberts said. "This is a resilient team and we've got to keep going."

To do so, however, the Dodgers will need to find more consistent answers to their myriad issues on the mound.

For most of Friday, the Dodgers' rotation problems loomed largest at Citizens Bank Park.

Prior to the game, Roberts announced that Urías had felt some discomfort in his hamstring during a bullpen session Thursday, was being scratched from his scheduled return to the rotation Sunday, and will now likely need at least another week or two (as well as a minor league rehab stint) before rejoining the team.

"He's going to keep throwing," Roberts said. "But I think when he tries to ramp up the intensity is when he sort of feels the tightness in the hamstring."

Once the first pitch arrived, it again became apparent how badly the Dodgers miss him.

Mixed bag for Ohtani, but Angels win

He homers among his three hits but pitches only five innings. Rookie Joyce injured.

ANGELS 5
SEATTLE 4

By Sarah Valenzuela

Shohei Ohtani has not felt like the 2022 pitching version of himself this season.

On Friday night the two-way star wasn't as dominant on the mound as he has been, giving up three earned runs over five innings in the Angels' 5-4 win over the Seattle Mariners at Angel Stadium.

The Angels, who have won five in a row, also found themselves worried about the health of rookie fireballer Ben Joyce, who departed his relief outing after only five pitches.

"I didn't feel really good today," Ohtani said in Japanese through interpreter Ippei Mizuhara. "Up to this point, I haven't really felt like I did last year when I was really good on the mound. But today, especially, I didn't feel as good."

Ohtani's start on Friday, in which he also gave up three hits, walked five batters and struck out six over 97 pitches, reflected a pattern this season in which he has looked closer to average.

In his first five starts of the season, Ohtani was so good that he seemed a lock to be a Cy Young candidate. Those first five starts (one shortened to two innings because of rain in Boston) netted him a 0.64 ERA. In his last eight starts, however, his ERA is 5.06.

This year, compared to any other for Ohtani in the majors, the right-hander is pitching more games due to the schedule the team worked out with him going into 2023. On a pitch-by-

Hernández injury could end career

Torn ACL means the Galaxy star's glorious run on the world stage could be over.

By Kevin Baxter

Javier "Chicharito" Hernández has likely played his last game for the Galaxy, and could see his career end as well, after tearing the anterior cruciate ligament in his right knee on a freak play in the first half of Wednesday's U.S. Open Cup quarterfinal in Sandy, Utah.

Hernández was charging up the center of the Real Salt Lake defense in the 24th minute when he stretched for a pass from teammate Riqui Puig about 15 yards outside the penalty area. Hernández, who was not touched on the play, then tumbled to the turf and immediately motioned to the Galaxy bench for help. The injury, confirmed in an MRI exam on Thursday, will require surgery to repair.

Recovery can take six to nine months, meaning Hernández won't be back this year. His contract with the Galaxy ends when the season does and at 35 and coming off a serious injury, he may find it difficult to find another club willing to give him a chance.

"I'm gutted for him," Galaxy coach Greg Vanney said. "It's a tough one. And the team has to process it too. He's the captain, a guy that's a leader for the group. So the group has to kind of process that he won't be with us again this year. He's close to a lot of guys."

But Vanney said he believes Hernández will play again, if only to write his own ending to a career that was arguably among the best ever for a Mexican player.

With the air clear, Baffert reappears

Trainer is back for the Belmont Stakes after race was threatened by wildfire smoke.

By John Cherwa

ELMONT, N.Y. — The sky over Belmont Park had cleared, gone was the orange haze from Canadian wildfires that forced state officials to suspend racing and training two days before the final leg of the Triple Crown.

Horse racing was to resume in a few hours as Bob Baffert hopped out of his black Escalade and pointed up.

"The weather here is better than California," Baffert said. "We haven't seen the sun in two weeks. It's cloudy and gloomy there."

Friday was Baffert's first time back at Belmont Park since 2018, when Justify completed his bid to become the 13th winner of the Triple Crown. It was wild back then, with about 50 members of the media breathlessly awaiting every utterance from the Hall of Fame trainer.

On Friday morning, there were only three reporters and a television cameraman. Baffert did three separate interviews rather than a collective one. He had the time.

"It feels good to be back here," Baffert said. "Belmont is nice and it's going to be big [Saturday]. It's exciting. The classics are exciting. To be part of it with a horse that has a chance, the excitement is there."

Clearly the media crowd was missing because a Triple Crown is not on the line. In fact, no horse has won two legs of the series since Justify. If anyone but Baffert's horse, National

22368 PACIFIC COAST HIGHWAY

With the luxurious location, style, and amenities of a holiday resort, this remarkable Carbon Beach oceanfront estate is both expansive and exceedingly comfortable. Three lots, totaling approximately 0.59 acre, have been combined to create the exceptional 120-foot frontage that commands a sweeping ocean panorama from Point Dume and the Malibu Pier to the Queen's Necklace and Catalina Island. Beyond its celebrity pedigree and architect of note, the entire property invites gracious indoor-outdoor entertaining and relaxation in an atmosphere of opulent privacy. From the porte-cochre entry to the beachfront pool and deep, wraparound decks, the home combines classical motifs with contemporary openness and light. The spectacular living room, which opens through multiple doors to the oceanfront deck, features two spacious seating areas, fireplace, and an in-wall projector and retractable movie screen. At one end of the living room is a chandelier dining area with ocean views and sliding glass doors to the deck. The adjacent kitchen is equipped for lavish entertaining with top-grade appliances, generous counter and cabinet space, a large island, wine storage, a built-in breakfast nook, and a butler's pantry with additional prep and storage space. Off the foyer is a spacious guest suite, complete with sitting room and two en-suite bedrooms. A wide staircase ascends to the upper floor, where there is an office, an en-suite gym/bedroom with mirrored walls and a private balcony, and six en-suite bedrooms, including the elegant primary suite. This private refuge has a grand foyer, tray ceiling, fireplace, sitting room/office, dual walk-in closets, dual salon-style bathrooms, and large pocket doors opening onto the upper level ocean-view wraparound deck, where there is ample space for lounging. The main-floor deck is an entertainer's dream, complete with an outdoor kitchen, bar seating, built-in barbecue, firepit, fountain, turf area, ocean-view pool and Jacuzzi, sound system, pergola, multiple settings for dining and relaxing, an outdoor shower, and a beach bathroom. The home is equipped with full security, intercom, fire sprinklers, and lovely landscaping. A rare estate of classical scale and contemporary restraint in an absolutely unmatched location.

The new homes are designed for the way people live today, with attractive design features like modern kitchens overlooking large great rooms, expansive bedroom suites with walk-in closets, and ample storage space. Skyview's floor plans feature up to four bedrooms and three-and-a-half baths, while the homes at Westport include up to six bedrooms and four baths.

The new communities are entering their final phases, and the few remaining homes provide a last chance for area shoppers to purchase in this highly desirable neighborhood. Homebuyers will enjoy the award-winning schools and the master plan's numerous resort-style amenities, including a pool, clubhouse, fitness center, spa, firepit and outdoor barbeques.

What sets KB Home apart is the company's focus on building strong, personal relationships with every customer – from those buying their first home to experienced buyers – so they have a real partner in the homebuying process. Every KB home is uniquely built for each customer, so no two KB homes are the same. Homebuyers have the ability to personalize their new home, from floor plans to where they live in the community. Their home comes to life in the KB Home Design Studio, a one-of-a-kind experience where customers get both expert advice and the opportunity to select from a wide range of design choices that fit their style and their budget. Reflecting the company's commitment to creating an exceptional homebuying experience, KB Home is the #1 customer-ranked national homebuilder in third-party buyer satisfaction surveys.

"KB Home is pleased to offer homebuyers in the Los Angeles area spacious new homes close to award-winning schools that live bigger for less," said Keltie Cole, President of KB Home's Los Angeles and Ventura Counties division. "Additionally, families will appreciate the master plan's resort-style amenities, which include a pool, fitness center, spa, firepit and outdoor barbeques."

Innovative design plays an essential role in every home KB builds. The company's floor plans inspire contemporary living, with a focus on roomy, light-filled spaces that have easy indoor/outdoor flow. KB homes are engineered to be highly energy and water efficient and include features that support healthier indoor environments. Thanks to quality construction techniques and materials, every home KB builds is designed to be ENERGY STAR® certified – a standard that fewer than 10% of new homes nationwide meet – to deliver greater comfort, well-being and utility cost savings than new homes without certification.

The new communities are situated on South Western Avenue just south of Palos Verdes Drive in San Pedro, a city nestled between Long Beach and Palos Verdes. Skyview and Westport at Ponte Vista will provide residents with easy access to the area's major employment centers, including Port of Los Angeles, Los Angeles Cruise Terminal, Long Beach Airport, Aerospace Corridor, Torrance Memorial Medical Center, Providence Little Company of Mary Medical Center Torrance and Kaiser Permanente®. The master plan is also just minutes away from popular beaches, golf courses, parks and waterfront shopping, dining and entertainment.

The sales offices and model homes are open for walk-in visits and private in-person tours by appointment. Homebuyers also have the flexibility to arrange a live video tour with a sales counselor. Pricing at Skyview and Westport starts from $1M and $1.2M, respectively.
